

Copyrighted, 1893, by BEADLE AND ADAMS.

ENTERED AS SECOND CLASS MATTER AT THE NEW YORK, N. Y., POST OFFICE.

August 9, 1893.

No.772.

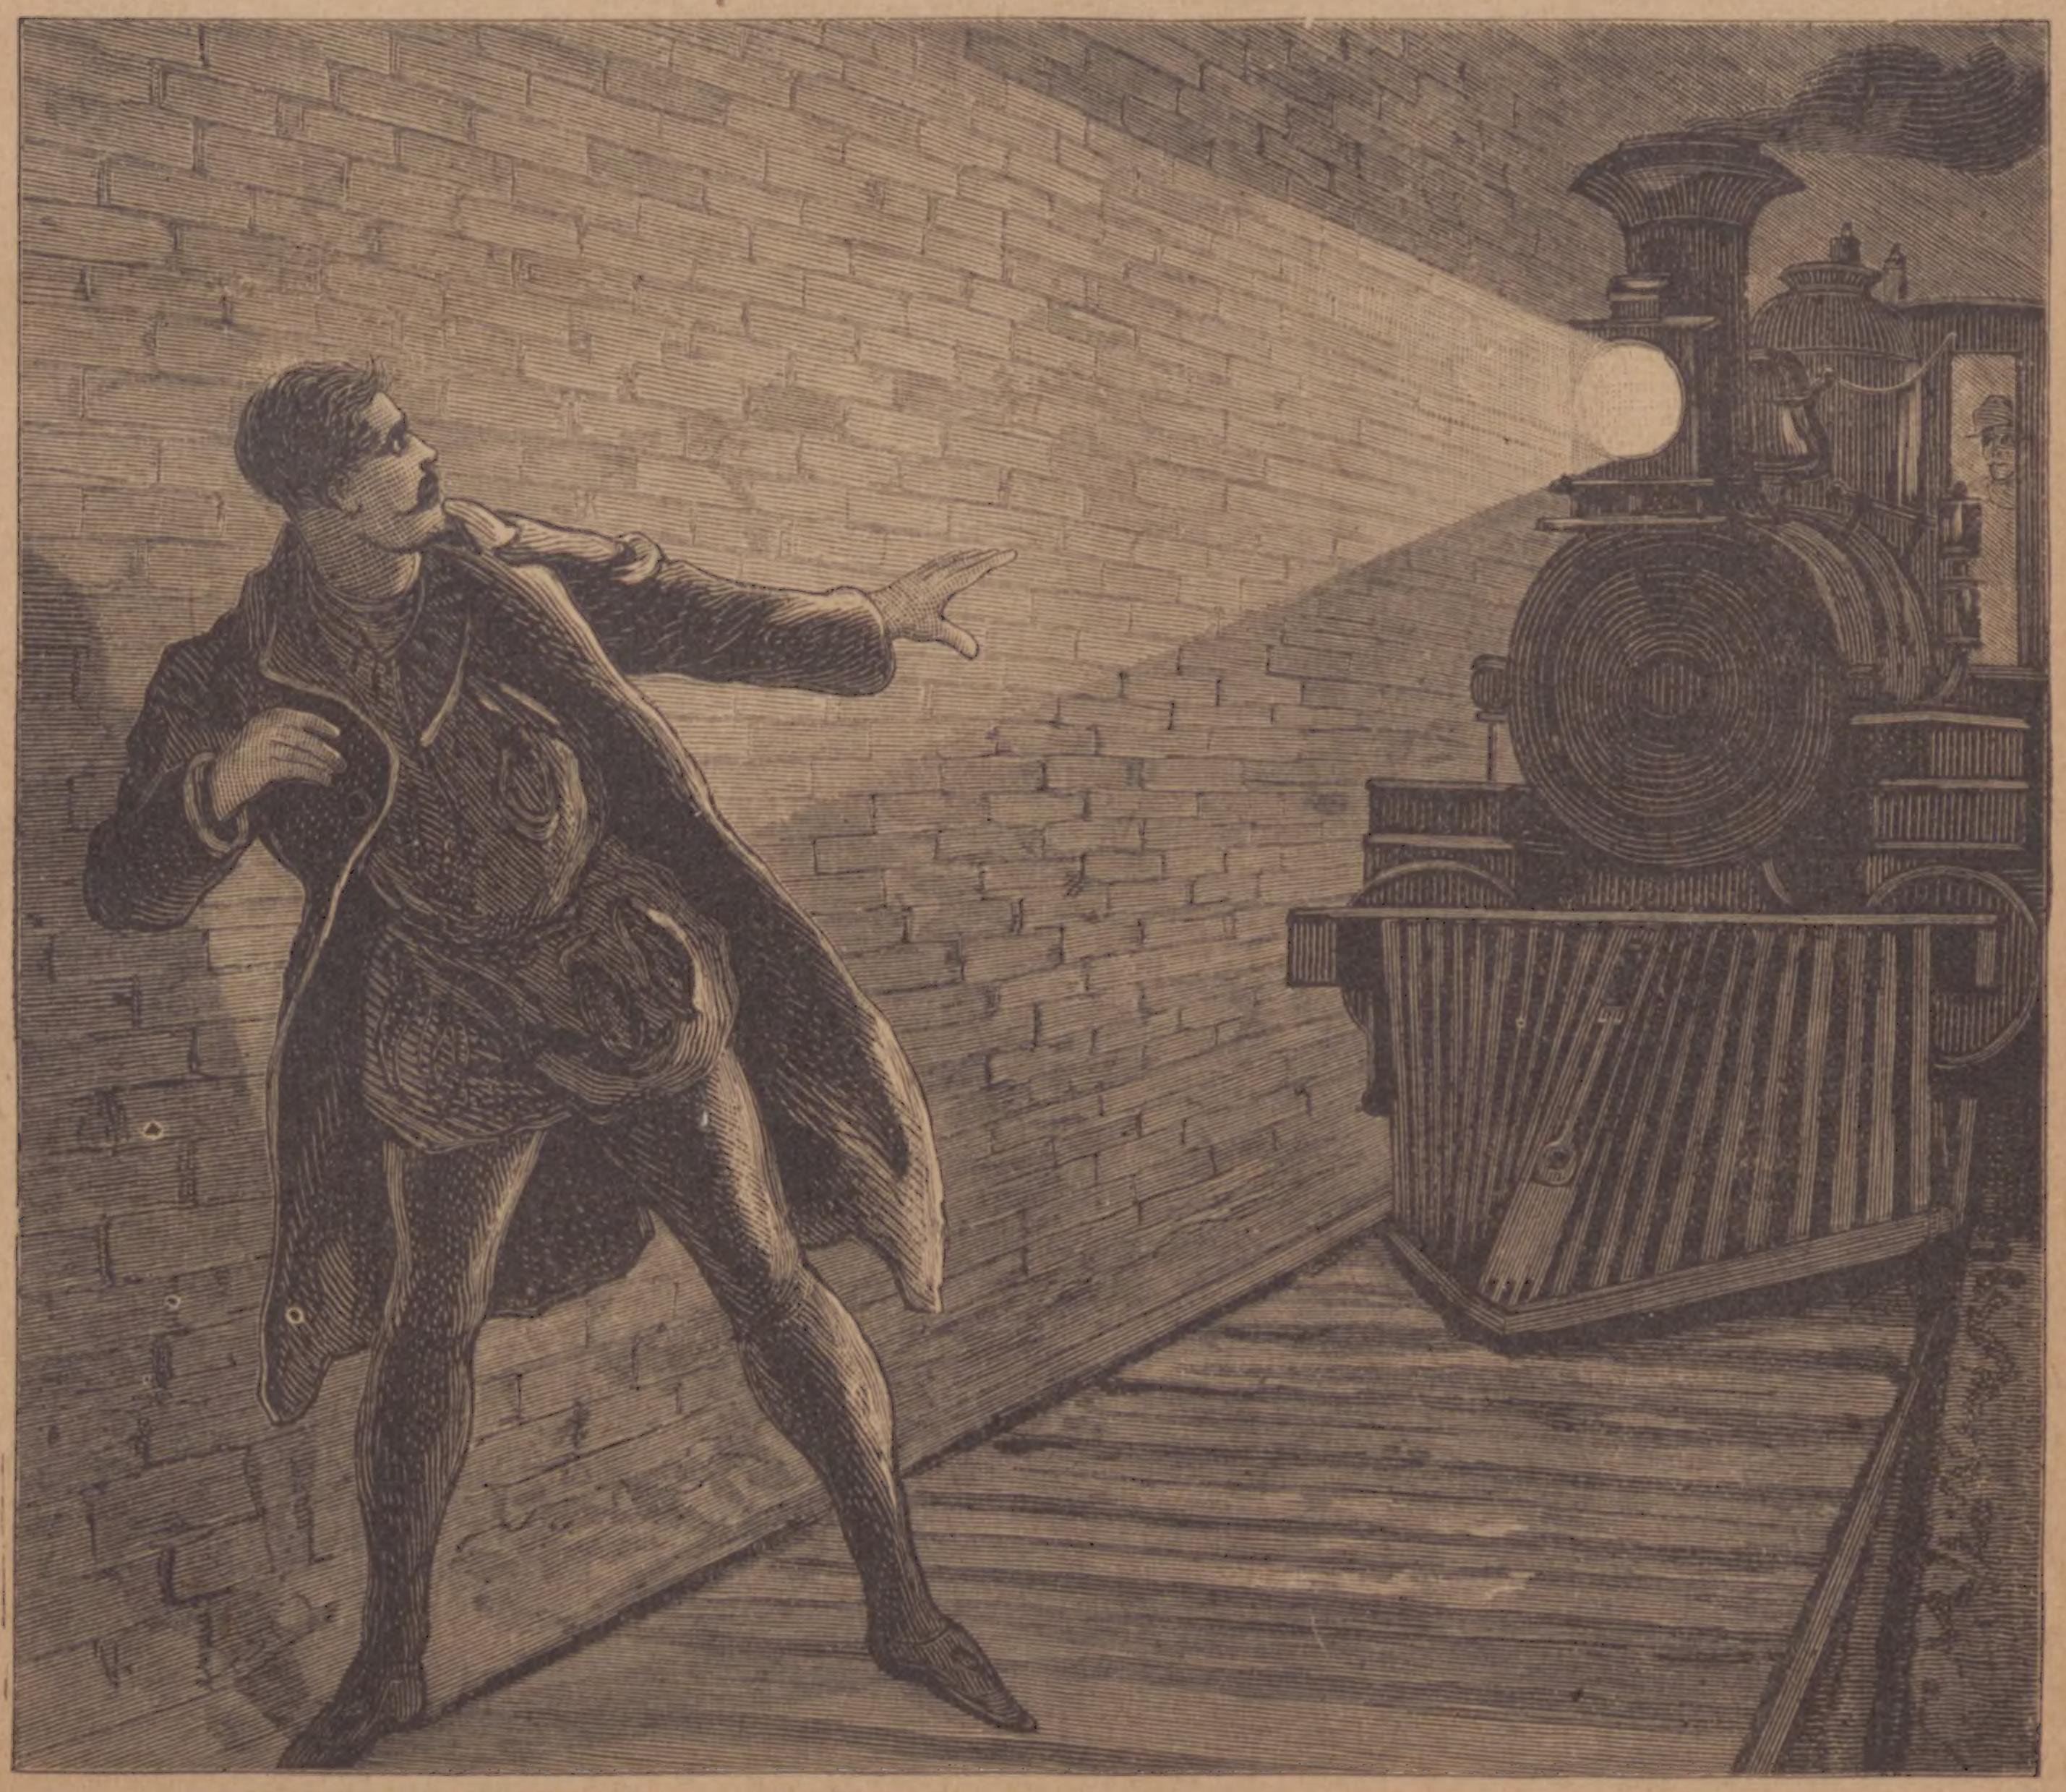

Published Every Wednesday. Beadle & Adams, Publishers, 98 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK.

Ten Cents a Copy. $5.00 a Year. Vol. LX.

CAPTAIN CORDEN, the Twister Detective.

BY GEORGE C. JENKS,

AUTHOR OF "SLEEPLESS EYE," "WILD PETE, THE BRONCHO BUSTER," "THE DRUMMER DETECTIVE," ETC., ETC.

THERE WAS NO HOPE! THE HEAT OF THE BOILER SENT A WARM BREATH OVER HIS BLANCHED FEATURES, AND HE KNEW THAT HE WAS DOOMED!

Captain Corden

The TWISTER DETECTIVE;

Snaring Slippery New York Crooks.

BY GEO. C. JENKS,

AUTHOR OF "SLEEPLESS-EYE," "WILD PETE, THE BRONCHO BUSTER," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

FOILED BY THE SERPENT.

THE masquerade ball was in full blast. Every window of the great Academy of Music on Fourteenth street, New York, was colors that was enough to turn the brain of | count of his ugliness, as could well be conany one not accustomed to such scenes. The ceived. stage and auditorium had been thrown into one by means of a false flooring over the replying directly to the Jew's rhapsody. chairs in the parquette, so that there was a vast level dancing space from the back of | kind of state to make our work very easy." the stage to the lobby in the rear of the parquette cirele. Tall palms and fragrant flowers were everywhere, while the odors of rare exotics mingled with the delicate perfumes carried by the fair dancers, and emphasized the feeling that stole over every one, that this was indeed fairy-land.

The music, from one of the best orchestras in New York, added to the glamour, and one could hardly realize that outside the streets | croaking about?" cried the new-comer, were cold and cheerless, and that people steadying himself by holding tight to Morris were generally at home and in bed at this | Cohen.

hour.

Costumes of all kinds were worn, the prin- than was good for him. cipal purpose seeming to be to get bright colors that would look well under the elec- | covered himself, after staggering under the tric lights, and help to form a portion of a weight of the blow that had been inflicted harmonious whole. There were knights, by the young man in a spirit of drunken soldiers, courtiers, princes, princesses, peas- playfulness, and forcing himself to smile, ant girls, harlequins, pierrots, Folly, with I said, in as mild a tone as he could assume at her cap and bells, and any number of nonde- | the moment: script costumes that did not represent anything in particular save the vagrant fancy of | this condition."

the wearer.

sweet strains.

rather exciting waltz, in which some hun- no saint, even if you don't get drunk. I was twisting the arm to such an extent and dreds of couples were participating, that a have never been so far gone before as I am in such a way that the big man was wholly tall man, in the slashed doublet and hose of to-night, and when I get over this (hic) I in the power of the good-natured young a Spanish grandee, over which was careless- never will be again. If I hadn't met that fellow, in the Charles II. costume. ly thrown a large cloak, stood behind a pillar, sanctimonious Morris, there, I wouldn't "They don't call you Cool Bob, the and, after watching the whirling throng for | have done it to-night." a moment, emitted a low but shrill whistle, that penetrated the sound of the music, and | deprecatingly, and whined: drew to his side a creature the very opposite of himself in appearance. He was a small other, that we had to open a bottle to is-" misshapen man, in evening dress, and wear- celebrate it. If there vas any one in New ing a black mask. He had a long nose, and | York v'at I love, it vas Valter Vantine, and | tones that proclaimed him at once to be an | vas." English Jew of the lower order.

"V'at you want, my tear?" he whined, in asked Jim Daly. a low tone. "I thought I 'eerd you vhistle." "It is a wonder you could hear anything. You seem to be getting sillier every day,' was the ungracious response of the other. "No. That vas because you vas vorried 'bout the job, and did not gif credit to your friends, my tear."

"Friends! You impudent rascal! Do you dare to call yourself friend?"

Jew, with a malicious grin that revealed his | eyes, was a diamond star, hardly rivaling in | Cool Bob looked steadily at Cohen for an vellow fangs, and did not add to his beauty. "Ve vorks together, don't ve? An' if ve ing through the black lace that covered her ain't friends, it's your own fault. I'd do face in lieu of the regulation mask. anything for you, Serpent."

Although the Jew spoke in a whining tone, and rubbed his hands in an obsequious manner as he uttered these words, there was a dangerous gleam in the eyes that could be seen through the holes in his black mask, and one could fancy that the yellow fangs | led her through a very zig-zaggy waltz. would tear and rend an enemy without hesitation should occasion arise.

Serpent thought so, too, for he did not an swer for a moment, as if he were collecting his ideas and trying to make up his mind whether it would be safe to give an angry reply. Apparently he decided in the negative, for when he addressed his companion again, it was in a much milder tone.

"See here, Morris Cohen, this is no time for idle talk. We are here for a certain purpose-"

"Of course ve are, my tear. Ve are here to enjoy the dancing, and to see all the pretty ladies, and to eat our supper, and to mingle with the good peoples what haf nodings to do but to enjoy themselves. That's v'at ve are here for. An' ve are having a good time, ain't ve, and vhen the ball breaks up, ve are going right home to bed, like good little boys, ain't ve?"

ablaze with light, and inside the building the come more expansive than ever, and he making her way to the supper room. With gayly-dressed dancers passed hither and looked as much like an imp that had been a motion to the Jew to keep near him, Jim thither in a kaleidoscopic confusion of bright | promoted to a high position below on ac- | Daly made straight for the supper room,

"Is he here?" asked the other, without

"Indeed he vas, and he is in the right

"Drunk?"

"As a boiled owl, my tear." "Good! Where is he now?"

body struck the larger man a tremendous blow on the back, that sent him forward from his shelter behind the pillar, in a very undignified manner.

"What are you (hic) two old ravens (hic)

He was a young man, with a handsome It was just midnight, and the supper face, that was terribly flushed by drinking served in the rooms leading from the ball- just now, but that was not the flush of a room was attracting a large portion of the confirmed drunkard. He wore evening gray hat, with its sweeping white plume, in merrymakers, although the dreamy waltz dress, and his disheveled shirt-front, the his hand. His costume was that of a cavalier just commenced was powerful enough to stains of wine on his white vest, and the of Charles II.'s time, and a long straight keep some of them, gliding over the waxed | crumpled condition of his coat, all indicated | sword swung carelessly from his belt, as if floor in an abandon of enjoyment of the that he had been spending some time in the wine-room, and had been drinking more

The one addressed as the "Serpent" re-

"Why, Walter! I am sorry to see you in

The Jew grinned, as he held up his hands,

"Vell, ve vas so very glad to see one an-

"Where are you going now, Walter?"

"Where am I going? What a question! (hic!) Iam going to dance the mazy (hic) waltz, and here is my partner." stolen up unperceived by the Jew or Daly, a contemptuous gesture and threw him off. and was standing at their elbow. She was "Yes, do as Bob tells you, Serpent. "Vell, then, your chum," returned the thick dark tresses that hung low over her you." brightness the eyes that could be seen flash- instant-while that worthy stood rubbing

> Like a gleam of lightning a look of intelligence was exchanged between this woman and the Serpent, as she took the arm of the young man, and suffered herself to be drawn into the throng of dancers in the middle of the room, where Walter Vantine

"That's all right. Kate Fairleigh has him in tow, and she will take care that he is Perhaps the man he had addressed as the 'kept here till we want to use him," muttered

Jim Daly. "The Queen of Night, eh? Very good character for her. I don't know a cleverer female crook in the whole city of New York. It's a pity women don't go into the business of cracking cribs. She has all the nerve required for such a job, and her delicate fingers would be just the thing for working the combinations of safes."

"Vat's that you say about combinations of safes, my tear?" put in Morris, with his usual grin.

"Nothing. I did not say so, did I?" "Yes, you did, my tear. You ought to break yourself of the habit of talking to yourself, my tear, or you might find yourself talking to a policeman some time, an' then it vould be awkward for you, don't you

The music stopped and Daly saw Kate The grin on Morris Cohen's face had be- Fairleigh, on the arm of Wallace Vantine.

> He was passing along under the dress circle, toward the door of the short hallway that led to the room, when he suddenly darted aside, and pulling from a pocket a black mask, adjusted it on his face with almost lightning-like rapidity. Then he resumed his careless saunter toward the door.

He had not gone half-a- dozen steps, when Ere Morris Cohen could answer, some- a hand grasped his wrists and brought him up with a round turn, while a pleasant voice said, in his ear:

"What's your hurry, Serpent?"

The speaker was a young man, almost a boy, with an open, ingenuous countenance, ruddy and full, lighted up by a pair of wideopen innocent dark-blue eyes, shaded by lashes long and dark, that gave an almost sleepy expression to the face. Golden brown hair, in crisp curls, covered his head, as could be seen now, for he held his broad ready for instant use. Lace ruffles fell over his hands, which were white and rather small, and altogether he looked like a very young dandy in the army of the "Merrie Monarch."

"You're breaking my wrist," growled Daly, in a low tone, in which fear and rage were curiously mingled.

"Am I?" was the quiet response.

"Sorry!"

A glance at the white hand holding Daly's wrist would have perhaps revealed, if the "Now, see here, Jim Daly, don't you go look had been steady enough, that it was It was during the maddest strains of a putting on any airs with me (hic.) You are pressing with a vise-like grip, and that it

Twister,' for nothing," grumbled Daly. "So you know me, then?" returned the other in pretended surprise.

"Yes, as well as you know that my name

"Jim Daly, commonly known as the Serpent," observed the young man, coolly. when he spoke there was a snuffle in his he loves me, Serpent, like nothing as never "I will give you five minutes to get out of this building," he added, still smiling, but without releasing his hold of the other's wrist."

"What for?"

"Don't argue, but do as I tell you," returned the other.

He turned toward a woman who had He released the wrist of the Serpent with dressed in a long black velvet robe, on That's v'at I always do," put in the voice of which ornaments of steel glistened here and | the Jew at this juncture. "He von't never there, while on her forehead, among the interfere with you, if you do v'at he tells > his hands and grinning under his mask—and then disappeared, as suddenly as he had come into sight.

> "Curse him!" muttered the Serpent, as he scowled around the room. "He is always interfering with my plans. I will get even with him yet, though, and he shall regret that he ever crossed the Serpent's trail."

"Vell, that vas all right. But ve had better get out, my tear. Kate is a good girl, and she vill bring Valter to the crib in good time," suggested the Serpent's confederate, looking uneasily about him as if he expected to meet the eyes of Cool Bob the Twister at every turn.

"For once, you are right," returned Daly. "We must get that young fool Vantine to the crib, and before he gets quite sober, obtain from him a written promise to help us in the job."

"V'at a lark it was!" snuffled Morris. "To make the young feller take a hand in robbing his own father's bank! He daren't blow the gaff on us when vonce ve get that paper."

"Shut up your wheezing, will you?" was the Serpent's ungracious response. "You talk too much."

"So do you, sometimes, my tear, as I told you a little while ago, so that we are even on that."

moment as if inclined to take him by the more than passing notice. throat, but changed his mind, and strode | The wagon was right across the street, swiftly to one of the doors leading to the street.

Reaching the corner of Fourteenth street, where the strains of the music came dreamily on the early morning air, he whistled softly, and out of the gloom, as if it had been produced by an enchanter's power, came a hansom cab.

"Get in!" commanded the Serpent, briefly, to Morris.

The other was about to obey, when he stopped suddenly and rubbed his hands in glee.

"Vell, this is good, by gracious!" he exclaimed, under his breath.

"Get out of the way!" whispered Kate Farleigh, authoritatively, as she led Walter Vantine from the shadow of the building. where they had been standing unseen by the others, and handed him to Jim Daly.

Without a word, Daly lifted the young man bodily and placed him in the cab, following quickly, and closing the door.

"Morris!" "Vell?"

"You need not come in the cab. Be at the crib as soon as you can, and I will join you in the course of an hour or so. I do not want to go straight there."

"All right. That vas sensible." every word! Why he had taken the trouble to listen to a matter that could hardly concern him we will discover, later.

In another moment Morris and Kate had disappeared, but whether they went together or not the cabman did not know.

"Drive up Fourth avenue," directed Jim

Daly, pushing up the trap and letting it fall instantly.

"Ail roight, sorr," answered the cabman, and away went the cab along Fourteenth avenue.

lithe figure, dressed in a neat-fitting business- help. sack coat with a soft felt hat surrounding the step of the cab he was seen by Daly, who isfied himself that the cab had gone. gave it a gentle twist, causing he horse to might have thought that he was merely swerve slightly.

"Ow!" exclaimed the driver, as he tried night's pleasure at the ball.

to pull his hand away.

"Silence!" ordered the stranger, in a stern whisper, that commanded obedience. "Drive right on and take no notice of me."

"An' who moight yez be, I'd loike to be knowing? I don't allow no feller ter be taking liberties wid me now, do ye moind?"

The driver raised his whip threateningly, but a twist of his left wrist made him drop get out of it. his whip on the roof of the cab with a | The main thing was to leave the cab withmovement of pain.

The stranger threw open the lapel of his coat and showed a small silver star on his taken too many chances to get this young vest, and the cabman's manner altered at man into his power, to let him go now. once.

"Captain Corden!"

"Yes. Now, see here, Barney Doran. You will help me if I need it?"

"Sure! an I will, sor!"

"And I will see that your application to get on the force is favorably considered." "Be jabers, Oi'll do anything you tell me, sor!"

tell you to turn off."
"Yis."

had dropped almost into a walk during the for which payment had been pressed toconversation. Captain Bob had released night. The Serpent held the check, and it his wrist, and stood like a statue, apparently lost in thought.

Near the corner or Twenty-eighth street an ash-wagon obstructed the way, and the cab was brought to a stop.

wagon, will yez?" cried Barney.

"Git out yerself," came the reply from the ashman.

"Oi'll break yer face for yez if ye don't do as Oi tell yez" was Barney's retort, and there ensued a war of words between the ashman and the cabman that are so com-and as there was a new building in course of erection at this spot, the piles of brick and mortar took up the rest of the roadway not occupied by the wagon. Barney was about to get down to carry out his threat to break the face of the ashman, when Captain Bob interfered.

"Let me go to him, Barney."

the house whin he goes home."

Bob leaped down and running to the ashman, seized him by the wrist, and gave speech and gave power to the limbs of the it his favorite twist, so that the burly fellow howled for mercy, and turned his wagon out without further parley.

"Be gob, he's a daisy," muttered Barney to himself, delightedly.

place by the side of the driver, but thought | with an ugly smile of satisfaction. "Now it might be as well to glance at the occupants | I guess I can handle him all right." of the cab, more especially as they had been very quiet all through the trouble with the stopped by the ash-wagon at Twenty-eighth ashman.

The cab was empty!

CHAPTER II.

JUST ONE CHANCE!

This colloquy had been carried on in | When Barney started his horse at Fourwhispered tones, but the cabman, who had | teenth street, Jim Daly was not taking everysobriquet of "Serpent" for nothing. He New York, and although he had been arrested several times for different crimes, a con- Twenty-eighth street to the east. had never been able to get him into their that their passengers had disappeared. clutches, with a Sing Sing case against him.

leaning his head there to rest it, after a without uttering a word.

"So, my dear Twister!" he muttered. "There is a plant, is there? Well, you haven't caught the Serpent, yet." As the cab drove on he sat in deep thought, biting the end of his long black mustache, and trying to think out some plan of escape. would require all the skill he possessed to it."

out being noticed. Not only that, but he must get his companion out, too. He had

As will have been gathered from the conversation between Morris and the Serpent, it was the intention to break into the bank of about fifty, with a pistol in his right hand, which Walter Vantine's father was president | peered out. and a large stockholder, and make Walter take part in the job. What power the two that was like that of a somnambulist. crooks held over the young fellow will be "Why, Mr. Walter," returned the other

"Good! Now, drive straight on, until I ing, they had induced him to sign a check for five hundred dollars with his father's name, to pay a poker debt contracted it a The driver whipped up his horse, which game with Jim Daly the night before, and was his intention to make the son of the banker give certain assistance in the robbery of the bank, or to present the check for payment at the bank, with the natural result of the fraud being at once discovered, and of "Git out of thot, wid yer ould mud | Walter Vantine being prosecuted for forgery. Alexander Vantine was well-known as a stern, hard man, of uncompromising integrity, who would prosecute his own son as soon as a stranger, and Walter would realize that there was no choice between the State Prison for forgery, or the possibility of getting there as an accomplice to the precious Jim Daly looked at his companion for a mon in New York as never to provoke pair who were fast getting him into their

"He's pretty far gone," muttered the Serpent, as he shook his companion and tried to bring some signs of life into him.

"Wha'sh ma'sher?" grunted Walter. "The fool!" was Daly's mental reply.

He felt in a pocket of the doublet he still wore as a Spanish grandee, and drew forth a small vial, which contained some liquid. He held it up in the reflection of an electric "All roight, captain; but faix, Oi'd loike | light that the cab happened to be passing, to have wan round wid him! Oi'd fix him | and shook it till it was all in a foam. Then up so that his woife wouldn't let him into he took out the cork and held it to the lips of the young man.

The effect was peculiar. It cleared the young fellow, but left him in a sort of hypnotic condition in which Jim Daly could hold him in perfect control.

"Ah! it would not do to try that too often, but it is mighty useful once in a Cool Corden was about to resume his while," observed the Serpent to himself,

It was at this moment that the cab was street.

In a twinkling, Jim Daly had signified to his companion that he was to get out, by catching him by the elbow. Walter did not say a word, nor offer the least resistance. So far as his movements were concerned, he might have been entirely sober, for he was steady as the Serpent himself. He obeyed been sitting on his perch behind, had opened | thing for granted, as Barney and the detec- | the direction of the hand on his arm, and the trap in the roof of the cab and had heard | tive supposed. He had not gained his | leaped out lightly on the right side of the cab, furthest from that on which now stood was known as one of the slipperiest crooks in | the detective, and then, still with the Serpent's hand upon him, walked swiftly along > viction had never been possible in his case. The maneuver had been accomplished so He knew as much about the law—that is, in | neatly, that it is no wonder neither the evading it—as he did about burglary, and driver of the cab nor the mysterious indialways so covered his tracks that the police | vidual with the powerful fingers, had noticed

For perhaps two blocks had the two flee-With this character, no wonder that he ing men passed along down this thoroughstreet to Union Square, where it turned to kept his eyes open when he found himself in fare, the young man making no resistance, the right and went at a fair pace up Fourth | a cab, being driven by a man whom he had | but going passively where he was led by his only seen once or twice, and whom he did | companion, when the Serpent, who had been Hardly had it turned the corner when a not think fit to trust further than he could keeping his eyes open for possible pursuit, crossed the street, and doubled on his track, suit, of dark material, consisting of a tight | So, when the detective jumped on the coming back to Fourth avenue, having sat-

whole, leaped upon the step behind, while happened to be looking through the side | For some distance up the avenue they a hand seized the left wrist of the driver and | window, although any one seeing him | walked rapidly, the Serpent deep in thought, and Walter Vantine moving mechanically,

> At the corner of a street, where a great stone-front building stood, they paused. There was a flight of iron steps leading to a. massive door at the corner, and on the door was inscribed the word, "Bank."

"Why not?" muttered the Serpent. "If I could do the job without the help of Mor-That he was in a trap he felt certain, and it ris, it would be so much the better. I'll try

> He whispered something in the ear of the young man, and Walter walked up the steps unhesitatingly and rapped thrice on the door with his knuckles, the Serpent standing in the shadow of the building, where he would not be seen by any one coming out of the bank.

> The door opened cautiously, and a man of

"Hello, Peter!" said Walter, in a voice understood when it is explained that, in his in surprise, as he admitted the young manhalf-intoxicated condition, earlier in the even- "What are you doing here at this time?"

ward until he stood facing the great doors of rest, and, what was almost as bad, in his esthe iron vault, Peter following him wonder- | timation, he had failed in his attempt upon

"He is as full as a goose," was the mental one stroke, if he had been successful.

At the side of the vault there was a small | What's that?" private room occupied during the day by the | His ear had caught the sound of a locomopresident of the bank. In this room was a live coming from the darkness along the sofa, where a person lying on it would have | tunnel, and the steady rumble told him that a full view of the vault.

this room and threw himself upon the sofa. | the faint light at the end of the tunnel, | asleep.

"This is a queer thing," thought Peter. | What should be do? The engine was "But I suppose it will have to go. Can't | coming along faster and faster and nearer interfere with a man coming into his own and nearer. He ran a few steps toward the

be the cashier."

membered he had not fastened, and was in Jim Daly knew that if he ran out, to avoid the act of turning the lock, when he was the engine, he would be in the hands of his seized from behind, and the next instant | enemy, and would stand little chance of eswas lying (n his face, helpless as baby, while | caping aga.n. some strong cords were being passed around | Jim had taken too many risks in the of the body.

The Serpent was standing over him, with an evil grin on his countenance, that was re- him, and now the glare of the headlight, like vealed in all its hideousness by the electric | the eye of an avenging monster, fell upon | lamp at the rear of the bank, just before the iron door of the vault.

"So far, excellent," muttered the Ser- it should it get to him. pent, as he glanced over at the slumbering Walter, who was snoring in a very hearty manner.

The Serpent was standing in the deep | hands! shadow behind the door, with the watch- He ran a few steps toward the detective, man, helpless, at his feet, when, casting his in an uncertain way, and then, with a eyes toward the window that looked out upon | smothered curse, ran the other way, in the Fourth avenue, he saw a face—the face of direction of the engine.

devil himself!" was the Serpent's inaudible | fiend, and made him gasp painfully. He remark. "He is onto my game, and I'll be squeezed himself tightly against the wall, run in before I even commence the job. I for the engine was only a few yards away was a fool to try to do it without Morris. He now. He shouted, but he might as well you vill stay up vhen I tells you, and if I

this."

door just wide enough to permit the passage | ahead. the top of his speed.

he knew that he was followed. He did not engine almost touched him, he took that one look back, but instinct told him that his chance! pursuer was none other than the Twister, one of the most astute, as well as dauntless detectives in New York.

For some distance the chase continued. with about the same distance between the cabs passing, close together, enabled the take young Walter Vantine in the cab. Serpent to increase his lead; by getting across ahead of them, but compelled the de- saw the cab drive away; but, needless to say her by the hag which restrained her, and ed a bridge over the railroad that runs up of the vehicle by the side of Barney Doran. Fourth avenue, where it is tunneled for Serpent swung himself and reaching the in the darkness. railroad track in safety, dashed at once into the tunnel.

Into the darkness he went for a hundred yards or so, and then paused to get his breath. "You infernal man-hunter," he growled, between his set teeth, as he shook his fist in the direction from which he had come. "I have fooled you this time. You have no idea where I am, and you can chase all over | ing man, Kate." New York if you like, without finding me."

Jim Daly would have presented a strange sight, if there had been anybody to look at him, or light enough to see him, in the tun nel. He wore a costume in which he had visited the ball, and over it a light overcoat that he had substitued for the cloak he had worn when first introduced to the reader. because the coat would not attract attention, while the cloak might have done so.

ingly, to see what he would do next. | the bank, that would have made him rich at | ejaculation of Peter, the watchman. "I "Never mind," he muttered. "It is only suppose he has stumbled in here, because he | put off for a short time. Can't expect everydoes not want to go home." thing to come my way, I suppose. Ha!

there was a train of cars behind it. At the Without a word, Walter Vantine entered | same moment, he could discover a figure in The next moment he was apparently fast | standing on the track. That figure he recognized as that of Cool Bob Corden!

He walked to the front door which he re- not seen the Serpent yet, in the darkness, his arms and body, so that he could not course of a wild and adventurous life, to move an inch. Then his revolver, which he lose his wits altogether, in whatever posihad had no chance to use, was wrested from | tion he might be placed, but he realized that his hand, and he received a hearty kick in his present predicament was a nasty one, the side that knocked most of the breath out | and that it would require all his nerve and | skill to escape with life and liberty.

Still the engine was bearing down upon the track behind him, and showed him that it would be utterly impossible for him to pass

And at the entrance of the tunnel stood the detective, like the incarnation of fate, waiting for him to be delivered into his Captain Corden—Cool Bob, the Twister. The smoke and steam from the engine "Curse that fellow! He must be the enveloped him, like the hot breath of a He stole softly to the door, turned the key to crush him. The engineer in his cab was before the face of the girl. without the least noise, and opening the sitting sideways, and was not even looking of his body, leaped down the flight of steps | There was no hope! The heat of the know what I know, and I am going to make at one jump, and ran up Fourth avenue at | boiler sent a warm breath over his blanched | features, and he knew that he was doomed! | von't let her talk to me." He had not gone half a dozen steps before | Stay! There was one chance, and as the

CHAPTER III.

A THUNDERBOLT.

Now to follow Morris Cohen and Kate men, until they reached a street where two | Fairleigh after they had left Jim Daly to |

tective to wait until the vehicles had passed. he did not know anything about the detec-It was at this point that the Serpent reach- | tive taking the liberty of riding on the back

"Now, Kate, are you coming with me to most of the distance. Over this bridge the the crib?" he asked, as the cab disappeared

"I don't care for your company," returned Kate, with a scornful flash of her dark eyes, "but I suppose I may as well go home, now that Jim is looking after that young fool himself."

"Certainly, my tear. You are a sensible girl, an' I'll marry you some day. V'at a vife you vill make for an honest, hard-vork-

"I know an honest, hard-working man who'll get cracked over the head with a cobble-stone if he doesn't stop talking like a fool," returned Kate, significantly. "Shut

The Jew saw that this was not likely to be an idle threat, and he did not address his fair companion again, until, after a ride on an Elevated train, they reached Baxter street, and for nd themselves in a small clothing store, where second-hand trowsers Brave and reckless as he was, he realized and coats were hung up in such profusion

Without answering, Walter walked for | that he had a narrow escape from ar | that a stranger would be some time finding his way to the back door that led from the store into a small back room.

But Morris and Kate were not strangers, and Morris turned the handle of the front door, after unlocking it, and walked straight to the rear room, with Kate at his heels.

"V'at's going on here?" he demanded, in querulous tones. "V'at are you in the dark

"V'at's that?" asked a voice out of the darkness, so much like his own that it sounded almost like an echo. "Vould you want me to waste money by keeping the gas alight vhile I was sleeping, my tear son?"

"Quit your squawking, and light the gas!" answered Morris, shortly, as he stumbled against a chair and barked his shins.

At once a dim light pervaded the apartfather's bank, especially when he happens to opening of the tunnel, but there stood the ment as a small gas jet was lighted, revealdetective and although the detective had ing a skinny old woman, in ragged garments, but with diamonds glistening in her ears, while another of magnificent luster held her dress together at the throat.

"Any one been here?" demanded Morris, as he threw himself into a chair, and undutifully pitched his hat in the direction of his mother for her to hang up behind the door.

"No von, my tear son. Did you haf a good time at the ball, Morris, to-night? Did the girls all vant to dance with you? Eh, Mor-

"Who's below?" demanded Morris, ignoring his mother's inquiries, and giving the table a shove so that it nearly knocked the old woman over, while Kate stood surveying the two with ill-concealed disgust.

"They're all there, Morris, and I've had to tell them to keep quiet two or three times. They vill talk loud, and they vill sing, vonce in a vhile, and it von't do in a respectable house, you know."

The hag grinned as she said this, and Morris joined in her silent mirth, although not without a cautious glance in the direction of Kate, who was impatiently tapping her foot on the floor during these remarks.

"Now, Mother Rachel, do you want me any more, or can I go to bed?" she asked. The old woman turned upon her in a perfect fury.

"You vill go to bed vhen I tells you, and would never have let me run into a plant like | have spared himself the trouble, for no | vant to make you jump in the river, you vill sound could be heard save the snorting and | do it, do you hear me?" spluttered Rachel, While thinking, the Serpent was acting. hissing of the iron power that was about clinching her skinny fists and shaking them

"Hush, mother!" put in Morris.

"I von't hush," answered his mother. "I that vicked hussy know her place, and I

As she spoke, the hag flew at the girl, and seizing her by the throat, shook her in a perfect frenzy of rage, but rather as if she were satisfying some old grudge, than taking satisfaction for present annoyances or offenses.

The girl allowed herself to be pulled hither and thither, although no one could doubt that she could have crushed the old fury had she cared to do so, so far as actual physical strength was concerned. But there seemed Morris rubbed his hands stealthily as he to be some mysterious power exercised over made her submit to injuries and indignities without resistance, and almost without pro-

> Old Rachel dragged the girl about, but it could easily be seen that the exertion was doing the beldam more harm than she was inflicting on her victim, and her dutiful son who recognized the fact, smiled with much enjoyment of the performance, without offering to interfere.

> At last Mother Rachel stopped, breathless. and stood panting and glowering at the girl with an expression of deadly hate, while Kate regarded her with a questioning look. as if to ask her whether she had finished with her.

"Get cut of my sight!" croaked the hag. at last, as soon as she could find her speech. "Go up-stairs, and stay there till I tells you to come out. If I catch you sneaking about the house, as I have on other nights, I'll-I'll burn you with a red-hot poker."

There was no doubt this was said in malignant earnest, although the ridiculous nature of the threat seemed to tickle Morris.

and he laughed outright.

The girl did not reply, but opening a door at the back of the room, which revealed a marrow, winding stairs, she disappeared, closing the door after her.

Jezebel. Then, turning to Morris, she con- the company. tinued: "Vell, my son, vhat news?"

"None. Jim Daly has young Vantine, and he vill bring him here after a vhile. Then ve will introduce him to the gentlemens vhat ve have down-stairs, and see vhat ve can do toward making old man Vantine pay up vhat he owes us out of the bank. You stay here, mother, and tell Daly I'm here bread, a ham, and several cups and saucers, when he comes, and mind you don't make with other etceteras of a meal, were a man him mad, because he gets stubborn when he's and a boy. The man was a tough of the and the room was in darkness. not in a good humor, and that won't do regulation New York type. He wore a now."

door leading to the staircase up which Kate | since it was the sort of thing that would be a | his eye. Fairleigh had gone, listened for a moment, dangerous weapon on the hand of a man and bolted the door.

pulled away a rug that lay there. Under to the sinister expression of his face. seamed in all directions. Morris thrust his edge of the evil ways of the great city that had already been turned up again. the carpet a tug. A large section of it gave | had lived all his life amid the shady by ways | way in his hands, revealing a square open- of Gotham. ing, under which the dirty boards of the "Well, blow me tight, if here ain't the floor were shown. The carpet had been so old mug himself!" exclaimed the boy, as the ingeniously prepared, however, that no one | Jew entered the room. "Billy, put a chair repairing the old floor covering. It was evi- has such good company. How are you, dent, now, however, that the seams were | Morris, old man?" there for a purpose other than appeared at a | He put out his small but dirty hand, and | glance.

Morris Cohen's brow grew dark as he heard down the hole.

them. there."

kind.

heel of his shoe caused a section of the floor. have any row, and I don't mean to have it, to give way, dropping down on hinges, and either. And another thing, I won't have any a hole three feet square, perfectly black and | card-playing down here." dark, was revealed.

"Look out, mother." "I vill, my son."

feet-upon a pile of sawdust. It was pitch | vill find their vay into the Tombs, right dark, but that did not trouble him. He knew avay. That's vhy." the place.

as he heard them.

"Vhen they make one job pay pretty vell, those fellows have no sense at all," he muttered "They must have what they call a | the Jew, with a grin. "But you can't fool good time, and act as if they vant to bring | your uncle." the police down on them. I'll give some of them up, and perhaps that vill be a warning | into his hat, and carried them to a corner of to the rest."

He groped his way along some distance, until stopped by a door, on the outer side of which he could hear the talking still going | they had been lying on a pile of bedding in on, although in softer tones than at first.

He tapped softly, but there was no response. Then he tapped a little louder, and | no doubt that some of them, at least, had | hurry." the silence that followed assured him that his signal had been heard, and that some one was reconnoitering.

A thin shaft of light fell full upon his face for a moment and then disappeared. The Jew grinned. "They didn't expect to see me, I guess, and they are getting all the things out of the vay before they open the door," was his inward comment. "Vell, if they think they mistaken. I vas on to their tricks."

a stream of light to come forth, and Morris slipped through the opening and closed the "I'd like to strangle her!" growled the old | door behind him, as he stood contemplating

> It was a motley crowd, and if the police had happened to drop in at that moment there would have been several arrests of people who bore the stamp of "suspicious characters" in every lineament of their faces, and every wrinkle of their flashy clothes.

Sitting at a table, on which were a loaf of the room started. who was able and willing to use his fists on | claimed the boy, as he flung open the door, "That's right, my son. Alvays be care- occasion. He had a short, turned-up nose, ful," observed the old woman, approvingly. that had been broken across the bridge at | whiskers that almost covered his face, allow-Morris did not answer, but shoving the some period of his career, and a scrubby, table away from the middle of the room, he | black mustache hid his upper lip and added | fingers into a small, ragged hole, and gave | might have belonged to a man of sixty, who

"Stow yer blab, will yer, Snipe? You take. "Mother, I thought you said you was 'ave too much to say for a kid," was the He could not hesitate, and just as the Billy Bowles.

A vigorous stamp on the floor with the | your headquarters, I told you I must not at greatly increased speed.

"Why not?" game, and when either of you win or lose, thought he had his prey in hand. Morris slipped into the hole, and dropped | you have to get into a scrap about it, and | The engineer had not noticed the man while he was waiting outside the door.

Billy the Bowler swept the poker chips the room where he pitched them down, but put the pack of cards into his pockets.

a distant corner of the room, without making any observations, although the Jew had been taking part in the friendly game of poker that he had interrupted so unceremoniously.

"That's right. Now, about this Vantine job," said the Jew. "Billy, are you ready to go to work to-night?"

"Yes." boy is useful sometimes."

when his name was given in full, from the ple. The Coleman House is known as one

The door was opened a little way, allowing | fact that he had been found in the gutter when a baby, but who was generally addressed as "Snipe" for short.

"Kids should be seen and not heard," observed Billy.

Snipe was about to make some rather sharp retort that might have led to a personal difficulty between him and Billy the Bowler, when the proceedings were interrupted by a loud banging at the door, so different from the customary guarded tap that every one in

"Dowse the glim!" whispered the Jew, and instantly the gas jet was turned low,

Then the boy went to the door and proplaid suit and a soft hat that came low over | ducing a small lantern with a strong reflector The old woman nodded, and then Morris | his forehead and partly obscured his right | placed it close to the door in a certain posiwent through the door into the store, looked | eye that bore traces of a scrap in the shape | tion, and took an observation of the person around to see that everything was safe, and of a large bruise. On his little finger was outside. There was a small opening in the came back to the parlor, carefully locking a heavy gold ring, perfectly plain, and evi- door through which the streak of light was the door as he did so. Then he went to the | dently worn more for use than ornament, | sent, and another one to which he applied

"Hully chee! If it ain't Sanders," exand admitted an old man, with long gray

ing only two sharp eyes to be seen. "What's the guff?" asked the Jew

"The Serpent's nabbed!" answered the old the rug was the old carpet, that had been | The boy was a diminutive youngster of | man, shortly, and sunk into a chair in front patched and mended so many times it was perhaps sixteen years of age, but with knowl- of the stove, with his back to the gas, that

CHAPTER IV.

A MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE.

When the Serpent found the engine would have suspected the seams which gave | for the gentleman, and pour out another | almost upon him in the Fourth avenue tunway were anything more than those made by | cup of coffee for him! It ain't often we | nel, he knew that he must act quickly, if he was to be saved from being crushed under the remorseless wheels.

As has already been intimated, he was a shook the claw of the Jew with effusive | man of great strength and activity, and his When he removed this portion of the car- | welcome, much to the embarrassment of | determination was on a par with his physipet, faint sounds of voices and laughter | Morris, who was anxious to deliver a lec- cal powers. In the course of his life he could be heard by listening intently, and ture on the noise he had heard as he came had been a locomotive engineer, and he knew the desperate chance he must under-

keeping them quiet. My! I could hear gruff retort of the tough he had called Billy, engine almost touched him he sprung from them people a block away, without listen- and who was called by his friends "Billy the ground and seized one of the iron posts ing. I'll soon stop them when I go down the Bowler," being a twist of his real name, that are to be noticed on most engines on either side of the boiler. It was a mere He placed his finger carefully on the head | "You are right, Billy, my dear," ac- | chance that he would reach it, but he did, of a rusty nail that was almost undiscernible | quiesced Morris. "And vhile ve are talk- | and the next moment he was standing on the under the layers of dirt, and a sharp click | ing about blab, let me tell you that you all | pilot, while the engineer, seeing that he was . told that the nail governed a lock of some | have too much to say down here. When I aproaching the outlet of the tunnel, put on agreed to let you people make my house more steam, and sent his engine flying along

The Serpent saw the detective standing back out of the way of the great machine. and a smile curled the lip of the crook as he noted the expression of disgust on the face "Because you can't play a gentleman's of Cool Bob at being outwitted just when he

out of sight; then the trap closed with a there is a chance that some day the police clinging to the pilot, but went on for a while muffled bang, and the old woman was alone. | will hear you, and they vill come down and | at good speed. Then he slackened, and Jim Morris did not drop very far-about six grab all the stakes, and most of the players | Daly, watching his opportunity, leaped off the engine, and made his way as rapidly as possible to Broadway. Twenty minutes He lifted up a corner of the table-cloth | later he was standing at the corner of Broad-The voices he had heard faintly up-stairs and showed a pack of cards and a pile of way and Fifth avenue, gazing quietly at the were now very distinct, and the Jew frowned | poker chips, which had been hastily covered | tower of Madison Square Garden that could just be distinguished in the gloom, as if he "Perhaps you thought I didn't know were some stranger who had come to New what was going on inside here?" observed | York to see the sights, and who was looking at the great city at night, as part of his enjoyment.

"Fooled!" he muttered. "Had everything in my hands, and now I'm worse off than ever. I can't go to the crib, and confess that I, Jim Daly, the Serpent, have been The were four other men in the room, but | trapped like a new hand, and that I have been made a fool of by that cursed Twister. Well, I got away from him, anyhow, and I don't think he will catch me again in a

> He lighted a cigar and walked quietly up Broadway till he reached the Coleman House, where he went in, with his coat buttoned up closely around him, asked the clerk for his key, said "Good-night," and made his way up to his room.

Jim Daly always made it a boast that he "Ve may have to take Snipe with us. A kept his business to himself, and at the Coleman House he passed for a California "You bet yer socks I'm right in it," put | business man, who had a taste for theatrican fool Morris Cohen they are very much in the boy, who was called Guttersnipe, cals, and liked to be among theatrical peoof the favorite hotels, and there are so many | way before he found a cab, and then he | people passing in and out and chatting in | caught one "on the fly," as it were, for the the office of the hotel, that a stranger is not driver was bowling along up Broadway likely to attract as much attention as would be the case in a quieter and less frequented house.

All these things Jim Daly knew, and he had been living at the Coleman for nearly a month, without any one troubling themselves about his goings or comings, and without his being suspected for anything other than what he represented himself to be.

On reaching his room he undressed and went to bed, where he fell asleep as peacefully as a child, his adventures of the night having no power to interfere with his rest, or apparently causing him any uneasiness.

While the Serpent was sleeping at his hotel, there was an altogether different scene in progress at the bank of which Alexander

Vantine was president.

he started in pursuit of the Serpent, was talking excitedly to a tall, stern-looking man, with iron-gray whiskers and a judicial aspect, in the small room by the side of the vault, while Walter Vantine still lay asleep on the sofa.

"You say my son appears to have been drugged, eh, Peter?" queried the sternlooking man, as he shook Walter.

"Yes, Mr. Vantine. He came in here, and talked wildly, and threw himself on the sofa. The next thing I knew, I was on the floor, with a rope around me, and before I realized the situation, I was being released by another man, who chased after the first, and left me."

"And then?"

"Then I pulled the electric alarm that goes into your house, and tried to wake up wonder if Oi was to meet the divil himself at last.

Mr. Walter."

"Um! A mysterious thing all around," muttered the banker, as he shook his son | now, but what for Oi don't know. He only | recognition. more vigorously than ever, and this time tould me to drive down to the post-office, with some success, for the young man and whin Oi asked him whether he was moved uneasily, and when he had been going to mail some letters, he tould me to foind it out?" answered Barney. shaken again, opened his eyes and looked, moind my own business, or Oi should never father.

"What are you doing here, Walter?" demanded his father.

Walter sat up on the sofa and looked from his father to Peter, and back again, but evidently without remembering anything that had taken place.

"What does this mean?" continued the

chattered.

the statue of liberty in New York harbor. have gone along all right if he had been fast The drug that had been given to the young asleep. fellow had totally destroyed his memory of Just as he got to this point in his cogitathe events of the night, and he could only | tions however, he had reached the corner of look helplessly into his father's face and Fourth avenue and Twenty-eight street, shake his head. He did not know how he where it will be remembered some building the time being.

"Call a cab, Peter."

"Must not leave the bank, sir."

" What do you mean?"

"My orders from you are that I am not to | most shot the banker out headfirst. go out of the bank until the cashier comes, at any time, even if you yourself ordered me | through the trap in the roof of the cab. "Oi | an' be back ag'in in a short time." to do so. That is your own rule, sir, and I hope as you was not hurt, sorr." cannot break through it."

he clapped the watchman on the shoulder, back in his seat.

and said, approvingly.

in my employ were as trustworthy as you. | liquor since Oi shwore aff two years ago " 1 will get the cab myself. Stay here and | He drove up the avenue until he reach-

watch Walter."

bank, as unbending as a Sphinx, and with quite worthy of a driver of a swell turnnothing in his countenance to reveal his out. thoughts or opinions of the extraordinary | "Well, Oi'll see this thing through now, proceedings that had brought him from bed | at all events," muttered Barney, as he threw at this unusual hour. He was strictly a jopen the doors of his cab, for the banker to man of business, and he was as methodical alight. as a well-regulated machine. This adventure | The banker deliberately took out his was something unprecedented in his ex- pocket-book and asked Barney Doran his perience, but he did not let it be seen that it | fare. disturbed him in the least. It was this "A dollar and a half," answered Barney response. habit of keeping himself thoroughly in con- mechanically. friendless boy, half a century before, into the banker, as he took a note-book from his fare-" with the directness of purpose that could only mean that he was through for the night. The banker's hail brought him to a halt, however.

"Cab!" cried the banker.

"Oi hear yez, bad 'cess ter yez!" growled | the driver, sotto voce. Then, raising his voice, he responded: "Is it a cab yez want?"

"Do you suppose I want a ferry-boat?" retorted Alexander Vantine, rather petulantly.

"Ow! Be me sowl, he's funny, ain't he?" muttered the driver. "Oi wonder if it 'u'd hurt him if Oi wor ter let the wheel go down a hole somewhere, and give him a shakingup. Be jabers, Oi'll do it if he don't moind himself."

directions.

"Vantine's bank," he said, briefly. "Phwat's that?" asked the driver, with a start. "I thought I spoke plainly. I said Vantine's bank, Fourth avenue. Do you know where it is?"

"Oi do thot."

"Then drive there right away," answered the banker, calmly, as he entered the cab.

"Well, be the powers, things be gettin' Then Oi lost them all, and now Oi have the ordinary happenings on this night. before Oi git through wid this noight's me fare, and tould me not to say anything your trying to overcharge me for the cab." to nobody about what Oi'd seen to-noight. He took out his notebook as he spoke, and before Oi shall know anything about it."

Although Barney Doran's mind was busy | meant. banker, as he shook his son until his teeth he was driving along mechanically in the direction of the bank, he being so used to | if I pay you well?" asked the banker. But he might as well have interrogated | handling the reins that he would probably had come into the bank, or even that he was operations were in progress, and where he there. He was not a responsible agent, for had had a controversy with an ashman some time before. Bricks and rubbish were scattered about the road, and now one of the wheels of the cab ran over a small pile of bricks and gave the cab a lurch that al-

"I beg your pardon, sorr," cried Barney,

"I hope you are sober," was the only you." The banker frowned for an instant; then reply of the banker, as he settled himself

"Oi hope Oi am, but be the powers, Oi'm "You are right, Peter. I wish every one not sure about it, though Oi haven't tasted

ed the bank, and drew up his horse with ly. "When did you see him last?" Alexander Vantine marched out of the a clatter that was very imposing, and Alexander Vantine had to walk to Broad- into the book. "Here is your dollar. interrupted Mr. Vantine.

Your number is 777, and you will hear from me again for trying to overcharge."

Alexander Vantine coolly replaced his pocketbook and note-book in their respective pockets, while Barney stood holding the dollar in his hand in silent admiration of the calmness of the banker, and too much surprised to utter a word of protest, although he knew that he was right, because the banker had not allowed for the fact that cabmen were permitted to charge night rates at four o'clock in the morning.

The banker walked deliberately up the steps of the bank, Barney watching him as he disappeared through the partly-opened doorway.

"Oi never heard of a bank being left that way, wid the door open, at this time in the day," thought Barney.

He had hardly had time to make this unuttered comment, when the banker appeared Grumbling thus, the cabman drew his at the top of the iron steps and beckoned to-Peter, the watchman, who had been re- vehicle to the curb and the banker stood for him. He responded to the motion by going leased from his bonds by the detective before a moment, before getting in, to give him up and following Mr. Vantine into the bank.

> Everything was just as he had left it a short time before, except that there was not. a sign of human life about. Peter the watchman, and his son, Walter Vantine, had vanished!

CHAPTER V.

A FOUL BLOW.

For at least a minute the banker stood. hot," was the muttered comment of the looking into the face of Barney Doran with driver, who was none other than Barney a mystified expression that was as near excite-Doran. "Here Oi had the young man an | ment as the cab-driver supposed ever came hour ago, and the Serpent and Cool Bob, into the face of the calm, cool man who the Twister, all in my cab at one toime. seemed to be the victim of a series of extraould fellow. Be jabers, Oi shouldn't "What's the matter, sorr?" asked Barney,

The expression on the face of the banker work. Oi took Cool Bob down-town just | changed from one of confusion to one of "Your name is Barney Doran, is it not?" "Begorra, you're roight, but how did yez.

"Never mind. I know you, and I can with a dazed expression, into the eyes of his | do for the foorce. Then he paid me double | trust you. I will not say anything about

> Begorra, Oi should like to know what it all crossed off an entry he had made with means. But Oi suppose Oi must wait till Oi | reference to the dollar and a half. Then heget on the foorce and become a detective smiled, in a dignified way, and held out myself, like Cool-Im'ane Captain Corden- | his hand, which Barney took in his own, without having the least idea what it all

"Can you give a little time to my service,

"What do you want me to do?" asked Barney, cautiously.

"Some detective work."

"Detective work, is it?" repeated Barney, while a flush of pleasure suffused his cheeks.

"Yes."

"Oi'm yer man!"

"Yes, I believe you are." "When am Oi ter begin?"

"Now." "Oi'm wid yez!" "But, your cab! You must get rid of that." "Oi'll drive up to the stable roight away,..

"Wait a minute, and I will go with

" All right."

"Do you know a certain man, of shady reputation, known as the Serpent, but whose real name is Jim Daly?" Barney Doran started, guiltily.

"I see you do," went on the banker, calm-

Barney was afraid of the mysterious banker, who seemed to have knowledge that one would not have expected to find in the possession of so quiet and respectable a member of society. "I asked you when you saw him last?" repeated the banker, as Barney hesitated.

"Oi'll tell you the whole truth," blurted. out Barney, at last.

"You'd better, I think," was the quiet.

"Oi was down at the Academy of Music: trol that had led to his growing from a poor, | "Your fare is exactly a dollar," remarked | last night, wid me cab, hoping ter get a good the wealthy and influential banker of to-day. pocket, and copied the number of the cab "What do you mean by a 'good' fare?"

what Oi charged him."

"So I supposed. Well?"

"Oi was engaged by a little hump backed feller, a sheeny, who gave me a dollar, and last. tould me to wait around the Academy till Oi saw him again. He had some friends inside, he said, who had a jag on, and he wanted them taken home as soon as he could get them out of the ball."

"Ah!"

"Well, Oi waited as Oi was tould, an' sure enough, pretty late, out come the Serpent wid the Jew, an' then a girl showed up wid a young feller who was purty full."

"Yes?" "The Serpent and the young feller got into the cab and Oi drove them up to the corner of Twenty-eighth street, and then Oi lost them both, as well as-"

"As well as what?"

Barney stammered and hesitated, but the detective as well as the Serpent and the almost." young fellow."

The banker remained lost in thought for a moment. Then his countenance cleared, as he saw his way out of the maze in which he had been lost for the last hour.

"Help me search this building thoroughly, and then I will go with you to take your cab home," he said.

The two men went through the bank, looking in every corner, to make sure that there was no one concealed about the premises. The banker looked at the vault door, and assured himself that it had not been tampered. My life is not worth anything to me, now." with, and that the treasure it contained had | The banker made room for the girl to sit been undisturbed since it had been put there the day before when the bank was closed by the cashier.

Then he went to the door and beckoned to an officer who chanced to be passing, and who knew him very well.

"My watchman is not here this morning, and I want you to keep your eye on the bank," explained the banker. "When you are relieved, tell the day man to do the same thing until opening time."

"Nothing wrong, I hope, Mr. Vantine," said the officer, anxiously, for robbery of the bank would be a serious reflection upon him, his beat covering the particular locality in which the bank was situated.

"Nothing wrong, so far. And there won't be, if you will do what I ask."

"Of course I will, Mr. Vantine."

The banker was an important man, and the officer knew that it was necessary for the safety of his own position that there should be no complaints about him from such a quarter.

Alexander Vantine came out, with Barney Doran, fastened the door, and, getting into the cab, told Barney to drive to the stable, but without giving him any inkling of what was to be the next move.

Barney drove rapidly toward Sixth avenue and Thirty-second street, near which point the stable was situated, and the banker kept his eyes open, more from habit than anything else, for he did not expect to gain any information that would assist him in his search for his son by looking out of the window of the cab.

It was still dark, although the large street arc lights shed a useful illumination upon most of the thoroughfares through which they passed. The cab crossed Broadway at Thirty-fifth street, and turned into Sixth avenue at its junction with Broadway. As it passed under the "L" tracks a woman ran to the horse's head and grasped the bridle with such force and so suddenly as to throw him back upon his haunches, at the same time almost hurling Barney over the roof of the cab head-first.

"Bad 'cess to yez! What be yez doing?"

demanded Barney, indignantly.

The woman took no notice of him, but springing upon the step of the cab at the side, looked Alexander Vantine full in the face.

"You are Mr. Vantine?" she demanded, breathlessly.

The banker did not appear surprised, but answered in his usual calm tones:

"That is my name. What do you want?" \ The woman pressed her hand to her heart and gasped. She was evidently exhausted by running. The banker waited impassive-

"A man who would not be particular about ly until she should recover sufficiently to card. They know me there. Tell them I speak, while Barney leaned over the roof of | will be responsible for the payment of the the cab and watched.

"My name is Kate Fairleigh," she said, at

"Be gob! It's the woman that Oi saw down at the Academy," muttered Barney. "Be me sowl! Here's more of it!"

"Well," observed the banker, "who is Kate Fairleigh?

"I know something about your son." Barney strained his ears to catch all that passed, in a state of intense excitement, but Alexander Vantine did not betray any more interest than if the girl had been talking about a total stranger.

"What about my son?" "I can tell you where he is."

"Where is he?"

"I dare not speak the name of the place. It would be as much as my life is worth."

"Pooh! We are in New York. This is a banker repeated his question, and Doran civilized city, with the finest police force in explaining that he had a fare down this end of found himself telling all he knew-about the the world, and detectives on every corner

The banker calmly blew his nose, and lay back in his seat, while waiting for his strange cempanion to go on.

"I know we are in New York," she returned, hurriedly, "and that is why I dare not speak. The wolves are always ready to pounce upon any one who will reveal their hiding-place, and they would kill me with as little compunction as a real wolf would tear a lamb to pieces. But I will take you to the place, if you will let me ride with you in the cab, and then, if they find me out, let them.

beside him, and asked, briefly: "Which for at least a quarter of an hour.

way?"

"Right down Broadway."

"Drive down Broadway, Barney," directed Mr. Vantine, to Barney, through the trap in the roof.

"All roight, sorr!" Adding softly to himself: "But, begorra, Oi don't like to work run another three or four miles. But Oi'm Oi'm thinking." bound to see this thing through now."

He whipped up his weary horse, and the cab went down Broadway at a good pace.

The banker did not address his companion again, and she did not volunteer any information. The two sat perfectly still in the cab, while Barney drove along, wondering how far he had to go.

At last they reached Union Square, and Kate called up to Barney:

"Turn into Fourth avenue, and down the Bowery."

Suddenly she signaled to him to stop, and the next instant she had sprung from the cab, and, pointing to a cheap hotel, on the corner of a street, whispered to Alexander Vantine:

"Go in there and engage a room for yourself, under the name of William Alexander. Then go into the reading-room and watch."

"What shall I see?"

"Something that will help you to find out where your son is. Wait till you learn some.

thing, or until you see me again."

The banker did not stop to argue the point with the girl. In fact, he had no chance to do so, for she had gone as soon as she uttered the last word, and the banker, astute as he was, could not understand how she had managed to disappear without leaving a trace of herself behind.

"Barney?" "Yis, sorr."

"I shall not go into the hotel."

"Won't yez, sorr?"

" No." "Why not, sorr?"

"Because I know where my boy is, and I am going there, instead.'

"You think that girl was fooling yez, then? Begorra, Oi suspected as much, me-

"Did you? Then I'm afraid you are an ass, Barney. The girl is sincere enough. But she is afraid some of those rascals that watch, and I dare say they are. Come with the cab there, for the night. Here is my and an ornament to your profession.'

"Wid the cab?"

livery bill."

"All right, sorr. But Oi don't think that is necessary when they will have the horse and cab for security for the bit the cr'ature will eat and the bed he will slape on."

"Do as I tell you. They may think you have stolen the rig."

Barney did not say anything more, but mounted to his seat, and prepared to drive away, but stopped himself.

"Where will you be, sorr, when I come back?"

"I will remain here."

"All roight, sorr. I won't be more than ten minutes."

Barney drove rapidly to the livery-stable, and after some parleying with the sleepy night hostler, who did not want to be bothered, arranged for the disposal of the horse and cab till he should return for them. town, and as he lived in the neighborhood, he did not want to take the cab up to the regular stable, at Sixth avenue and Thirtysecond street.

"Take care of him," was Barney's last remark, as he walked briskly away, down to the corner on the Bowery, where he had left the banker.

"Phwere the dickens is he?" muttered Barney, as he looked about, but could not see anything of Mr Vantine. There's plenty of light about here. He can't be far away, and Oi ought to be able to see him."

He walked up and down, peered into the doorways, went across the street, and back again, searching in every nook and corner

The banker had gone!

"Well, if that ain't a dirty trick to play on a man as was trying to do the square thing!" observed Barney, to himself, in a tone expressive of injury as well as disgust. "Oi never thought he would do it. Be gob, Oi ain't much of a detective, after all, the horse so hard. It's toime he was going | when Oi'll let a man get away from me loike to his stable, so it is, instead of making him | that. Oi'd better stick to me cab-driving,

He walked up and down for a few minutes longer, hoping against hope that he would catch a glimpse of the banker, but every moment feeling more and more sure that that calm, inscrutable gentleman had given him the slip, for some purpose of his own.

He had just reached this conclusion when, suddenly, something came crashing upon the back of his head, and he knew no more.

"You shouldn't try to do things that you do not know anything about, my tear!" said a snuffling voice that Barney would have recognized as that of Morris Cohen, had he been in a condition to recognize anything, as that worthy patted a handy-billy that he carried in his right hand and with which he had dealt poor Barney Doran the blow that had knocked him senseless.

TRAPPING THE FOE.

THE effect of the declaration of the old man in the secret room under the Baxter street clothing store, that the Serpent was caught, was almost electrical.

Everybody in the room crowded around the old man whom the boy had called Sanders, and demanded to know how it had been accomplished.

"How do you think?" snuffled Sanders! "Who is it that is always interfering with our business, eh? Who was it sent me up to Sing Sing for five years for a job as I wasn't in, eh?" he demanded, looking so fiercely at Morris that that amiable gentleman turned up his eyes in pious deprecation. "Who was it? You all know. Speak his name?"

"Captain Bob, the Twister," screamed the Jew, in a sudden rage. "Yes, it vas always

"But I'll get my fingers at his throat some day, the blooming cuss! An' when I do, I'll twist him' exclaimed Billy the Bowler. "Why, burn my body! Ever since I come seem to have her in their power are on the over 'ere from dear old Lunnon, to do a little business in a gentlemanly way, 'e 'as been a-chasin of me. But I'll choke im to death when I do get my 'ands on 'im!"

"No. We must get rid of that. There | "Will you now?" said Sanders, with his is a livery stable down that street. Take | usual snuffle. "You are a good boy, Billy,

Morris, impatiently. "How vas he caught?" "At Vantine's bank."

"At Vantine's bank?" echoed Billy the to be seen but darkness.

Bowler and the Jew, in chorus.

Vantine, but the scheme he was playing did | then disappeared? not work very well, because, it seems, Cool Old Sanders was hugging the stove, and Bob had got wind of the job in some way, yet, if one had watched him closely, they and the next thing the Serpent knew, he was | might have seen that those bright eyes of wearing a pair of handcuffs and on his way his, in the depths of the hair that covered to the nearest police station."

which there was a good deal of the suspicion | remark. habitual to him. "When did you come down from the river?" "From Sing Sing?"

" Yns." ...

mistake in figuring up my time for conduct | the shadow before, he could hardly have from his appearance. in the pen, for they let me out yesterday, avoided noticing this face, or the eager and I was just in time to get on to the glance around the room of the dark eyes be-Twister's little game."

"But you couldn't block it."

this room that could do it either," returned and then, softly and swiftly, she passed in-Sanders, as he made his was to the back of | side, and went to a screen that stood in the the stove, and rudely shoving one of the | shadow in a corner of the apartment opposlumbering men aside, took a shovelful of site to that in which the slumberers were coal from a box and threw it into the stove.

As he did so, the glare of the fire fell full upon his face, and Morris Cohen, who place, and yet, strange to say, did not make happened to be looking at him, started, and then smiled, as if a foolish thought had crossed his mind, and instantly been dismissed as unworthy of being entertained.

What that thought was may be revealed go out.

before very long.

goin' ter do?" said Billy. "We can't let the | irreverently. "But, hully chee! I think Serpent reman in the hands of the cops, can | you are homelier than ever!' we?"

the Jew. "Talk sense, my tear. Do you lowed by the Israelite, who closed the door vant to go up to the station an' tell them he after him while the spring lock shot into vas a friend of yours, ch? If you do, go place.

rebuke, and then lighting a very strong moment, as if in thought. brier-root pipe, puffed away in silence, mak- He soon made up his mind what to do, Bowler's valiant defiance. ing the Jew cough violently before he was however, for he walked over to the screen able to speak again. When he had recovered, and seized the wrist of Kate Fairleigh with which he did with a great deal of wheezing | his right hand, while he placed his left over and with his eyes full of tears, he said, her mouth. decisively:

around, and try to find what has become of looked.

young Vantine. Who will go?" "I will!" volunteered Billy the Bowler, ear.

promptly.

You would go scrapping with whoever you from her mouth a little way, but was ready might find there, and be taken to the police to clap it over her lips instantly if he saw station to keep the Serpent company. No, any disposition on her part to cry out or to no, Billy. You are all right for a knock- endeavor to attract the attention of the other about job, where it is necessary to slug inmates of the room, who were apparently somebody into obedience, but you vas no all asleep. good for fine work."

"P'raps you're right, Morris," acquiesced | manded. Billy, reluctantly. "I can't do things in the snaky sort o' way that you can. It in a sulky whisper. seems to me, then, that you is the only one that can go."

The Jew shrugged his shoulders in modest would undertake the job of finding out just | searching glance of the old man. how the land lay, and would, if possible, bring young Walter Vantine back with him. | to-night?"

"And I'll take Snipe with me." "All right, Morris. I've been asleep all | the job out of my hands." the night, and I'm in shape for anything," observed Guttersnipe, cheerfully.

"I don't care whether you've had sleep or not," croaked Morris. "Vhen there is vork in surprise. for you to do, you must do it, no matter how you feel. Mind that, my tear." The Jew opened the door, but before he went out, took a cup of coffee out of the coffee-pot that was steaming on the stove, and swallowed it in hasty gulps, Guttersnipe following his example, and also fortifying himself with a good drink of the strong liquid.

Billy the Bowler had thrown himself on a mattress in the corner, and was evidently in a doze. He had accustomed himself to snatch a few minntes of sleep at any time and under any circumstances, because the sort of life he led demanded that he should | . "You want to know what you are to do? be operating at a time when respectable peo-

"But v'at about the Serpent?" interrupted | ple were in bed, and he was compelled to sleep when and how he could.

Through the open door there was nothing

But—what was that, which seemed like a

"Yes. He was in the bank, with young deeper shadow just outside the door, and his face, were restlessly peering about the "How did you learn all this?" asked the room, and that they had noticed the myste-Jew, looking at Sanders with keen eyes in rious shadow, although he did not make any

The shadow appeared again, and this time a face came so close to the doorway that it could easily have been seen by any one whose the floor, howling with pain, while Kate face was turned in that direction. The old "Yesterday. I did not expect to get out | man may have failed to see the face, because | upon him for protection, old and feeble as for another week, but I must have made a | he did not make any sign, and yet if he saw | he might well be supposed to be, judging longing thereto.

It was the face of Kate Fairleigh!

"No. I don't think there is any one in | For an instant she looked about the room, now snoring in concert.

Sanders's eyes followed her to her hidingany observation.

"That vill do. I feel like a new man now," said the Jew, with a sigh of satisfaction, as he put down his cup and prepared to

"If you were a new man, you might be "Well, what the bloomin'dickens are we handsomer than you are," observed Snipe,

Morris aimed a blow at him, which the lad "How are ve to get him out?" responded | dexterously dodged, and then ran out, fol-

The girl struggled, but she was helpless "Some one must go to the bank, and look in the grasp of the old man, weak as he

"Don't speak a word!" he hissed, in her

She shook her head as a sign that she "Yes, you would make a nice fist of it. | would obey, and Sanders removed his hand

"Why did you come down here?" he de-

"To see what was going on," she answered,

"And then?"

"None of your business!"

"You were to bring Walter Vantine here

"Yes, but Morris and the Serpent took

There was a world of meaning in this brief exclamation, and the girl looked at him

"Do you know anything about it? Morris Cohen came home without him, and the Serpent hasn't been around, and I don't know what shape the matter is in," she said, below her breath.

Sanders maintained his steady look upon her, and then he whispered in her ear, placing his hand quickly over her mouth to stop the cry of surprise that he saw was about to arise to her lips.

"That is all right," he muttered. "Now, you do as I tell you, and you may find it a good thing for you." "But-"

Well, you shall know in good time," he said, with a wrinkle of his forehead and eyelids that suggested the possibility of his laughing under his whiskers.

The girl was about to make some response, when, suddenly, the screen was pulled down, and Billy the Bowler seized the girl by the shoulder and spun her around.

"Oho! So you have come down 'ere sneakin' an' tryin' to find out things what you 'adn't ought to know, 'ave yer?" exclaimed Billy, with a sinister grin. "Well, I'll knock yer bloomin' 'ead off. That's what I'll do."

He raised his ponderous fist, and would doubtless have carried out his threat, but for the interference of the old man, who seized him by the wrist and threw him to shrunk behind Sanders, as if she depended

The Bowler was upon his feet in an instant, and rushed to the fray with a bellow of rage. He aimed a blow at the old man's face that would have sent him spinning to the other end of the room if it had taken effect. But, Sanders was not to be caught that way. He sprung aside with an agility wonderful for an old man, and at the same time planted his left fist on Billy's face with a force that threatened to blacken the other eye.

"Ello! So you've l'arned to use yer dukes while you were up at Sing Sing, 'ave yer?" spluttered the Bowler, as he came forward again, with more caution than he had displayed hitherto. "Well, come on, an' ave a mill, an' I'll make yer awfully sick, my covey!"

Billy the Bowler was an adept in boxing, and perhaps he would not have received the blow in the eye from Sanders without making an instant reprisal had he not been taken by surprise.

He never knew Sanders to display such skill with his fists before and he was not expecting any resistance from the old man.

right avay, an' see v'at they will say to you." | Sanders arose from his seat by the stove | Sanders did not speak, but he had his Billy the Bowler hung his head under this and bolted the door. Then he stood for a hands up in the regulation boxing attitude, and did not evince the least fear at the

> When the young man advanced and after a little sparring, during which he danced about on his toes like a male ballet-dancer, made a lunge at him, Sanders returned quicklyor, as sporting writers, say "countered"-on his mouth, with a force that made his teeth rattle and cut his upper lip badly. Then the two men went at each other hammerand-tongs, and there was enough excitement to have brought the police down upon them had they not been well out of hearing of the street.

> How the battle might have ended cannot be said positively, for the noise awoke the men who had been sleeping on the bedding in the other corner of the room, and, just as Sanders was about to plant a vigorous "upper-cut" on the point of the Bowler's jaw, he was seized from behind by two others and held so that he could not free himself.

At the same moment Billy avenged himself for several ugly blows that had been Sanders looked her in the eyes, and, in dealt him by his antagonist, by giving self-depreciation, but at last agreed that he spite of herself, her bold gaze fell before the Sanders a ringing slap on the cheek with his open hand that disarranged the gray whiskers, and made Billy open his eyes.

He saw that the whiskers were false, and ere Kate Fairleigh could stop him-which she tried to do-he had snatched them from the face of the old man, and revealed the fact that the supposed Sanders was-" Cool Bob, the Twister," the dreaded detective!

> CHAPTER VII. A DESPERATE TWIST

"On! 'ere's luck!" cried Billy the Bowler. joyously. "Got the fox right in the trap! Well, if this ain't the rummest go I ever seen! 'Old him tight, fellers, while I go through 'im. Who'd 'a' thought as 'e would 'a' been sich a fool!"

Billy fairly danced with glee, as he thrust his hands into the detective's pockets one after the other, and placed the contents npon the table. A six-shooter, a pair of handcuffs, a pocketbook well supplied wibills, a pocket knife, and a few other articles, were all that the pockets of Cool Bob contained. There was no note-book, as Billy hoped there would be, to give a clue to certain plans that the detective might be following to catch the crooks, and in fact and he was in pitchy darkness. there was not a scrap of writing of any kind about his person.

The detective did not make any remark while the men were searching him, and if he was chagrined, he did not show it by word or look. He was as perfectly cool as might have been expected of a man who was known to every thief in the city of New York as a man whom nothing could disturb.

"What are you going to do with him?" asked one of the men, a low-browed fellow, who rejoiced in the cognomen of Ikey Bill.

"Shove im in the cellar till Morris comes back, of course."

"All right!"

"Suppose you put them bracelets on is 'ands. It will make 'im feel more comfortabler like," suggested Billy.

cuffs with an ominous click, so that Cool Bob | had he of ever getting out alive. He knew was absolutely helpless.

Kate Fairleigh had slipped back the bolts, and was in the act of opening the spring lock. He sprung to her side, and caught her before she could get through, as was evidently her intention.

"No yer don't, my pretty donah! I'm awatchin' yer. You've tried it at the wrong time." up in an instant, and fastening her ten nails in the Bowler's face, scored it down, so that it was covered with blood. He struck at her wildly, but she darted away from him, and, picking up the big iron poker, threatened to brain him if he came within reach.

'er case afterward."

The detective had watched this episode "Sewage," he muttered. if he were amused, without caring what a large round object, that he recognized as iron of the handcuffs give way? call to help him in case he needed assistance and Ikey Bill, moving the stove, in such a; the feat after a few ineffectual efforts. manner that the stove-pipe was not displaced, but so that the space under the stove was before him, his face coming into contact with made quite clear, pushed aside the square of zinc, that appeared to be nailed to the floor, but wasn't, pulled up a trap by means of a small iron ring imbedded in the wood, and so caked over with dirt that it would hardly have been noticed by a stranger.

interested in this arrangement, and the that he was in a cellar about twelve feet | right hand, for there was a click that told him Bowler evidently knew what was passing in his mind, for he said, with a grin.

crib, don't yer, Twister? So you are, but it ain't a-goin' to do yer any good, for I don't think you will 'ave a chance to do any more detective work in this world, smart as you think you are."

"Think not?" observed the detective, quietly. "We cannot always tell, you know."

"Yes, we can-this time, any'ow. Now, boys, down with him!"

When the trap was lifted up it did not reveal a hole, as might have been expected, but another floor, apparently, there being only the thickness of the joists of the upper floor to the boards below. It was hard to understand at first what could be the object in having a trap here at all, when there was nothing below but this second floor.

The detective was soon shown what it meant, however, for he was forced to stand on the false flooring in the trap, and then, it went down with him.

the upper floor than the trap closed over him

It would be impossible to conceive a more helpless position than that in which the detective found himself now His hands were fastened behind him, and he was dropping he knew not where. He could not judge with any certainty how far he had been sent down, but he was sure the pit, or cellar, was a considerable distance below the underground kitchen.

The trap stopped with a suddenness that made him step off it involuntarily, and then he heard it sliding up and rattling against the floor far over his head.

Bob was obliged to admit to himself that he served." was in a very bad fix this time. In one of Cool Bob knew all about the handcuffs he too well that he could not expect any mercy Just as this operation was performed, from the band that had him in their power. Billy heard a noise at the door, and saw that | Every member of it had reason to fear him, upon him, they knew that he would hunt the free sunlight again.

All these reflections passed quickly through the detective's brain and made him set his most to cut into the flesh, the little difference As he spoke he gave her a brutal wrench | wits to work for some plan by which he | was just enough to prevent his slipping out that threw her to the floor. But she was could baffle them. He knew that not one of of them. them would be equal to him single-handed. but it was hard for him to fight against such strong odds as faced him now.

where he was, and whether there could be least. "I must try the twist." any outlet from his prison besides that above. foot of water.

might be done to him. He was in a tight a sewer-pipe. He met the obstruction with nature to feel apprehensive, and he was as and he had the pleasure of finding his face in calm now as if he were in his office at Police; a deep puddle of what he could tell, by the Headquarters, with fifty stout officers within taste and smell, was very dirty water. It "Open the door," ordered Billy, briefly, he was lithe and active, and he accomplished

He found that there was a brick wall just the cold and slimy bricks, and he began to have a pretty clear idea of where he was.

The knowledge did not give him much pleasure, however, for he recognized the for another try." fact that there was very little hope of escape easily understood that it made a very convenient place for the hiding of stolen property, and that the excellent gentlemen over his head were accustomed to apply it to that purpose.

Having decided where he was, he had time to think about what should be his next move. He had no intention of remaining inactive, even if nothing could come of his trying to escape. He must have the satisfaction of knowing that he had done all that was possible to a man before he submitted to his enemies.

He thought hard for a few moments, and then he made his way over to the spot where he had walked into the water, and where a faint trickling sound struck his ear.

The water was evidently somewhere. Where was it running to and where did it come from? He asked himself this question, and it was swift as the wind, he was dropped out of not long before he could answer it. Feeling sight. The second flooring was a trap on along the great iron sewer-pipe with his pulleys, like those used in the stages of the- elbow and knee, whichever he found most aters, and when his weight pressed upon it, | convenient, he discovered that the iron pipe

No sooner was his head below the level of and that the water was escaping from the opening in a steady stream.

Gauging the spot carefully, he placed his heel against the pipe by the side of the opening, and pushed with all his force. As he had hoped, his heel broke off a large piece of rusty iron, and the hole was widened considerably. The iron was almost thin as cardboard at that point, and it would not require much force to break away a great deal more of it.

Cool Bob smiled as a new hope sprung up in his breast, and he plied his heel to the iron with redoubled energy, sending another section of the pipe out of place.

"So far, good," he exclaimed, with a For a moment he stood quite still, to try chuckle. "But I cannot go any further and collect his thoughts. Accustomed to all with these things on my wrists. I must try sorts of uncanny adventures as he was, Cool how far my nickname of the Twister is de-

Ikey Bill, with a grin of malignant the worst quarters of New York, and far un- wore. They were his own, and he had used triumph, forced the detective's hands to- derground, with his hands fastened behind | them on many a desperate criminal, without gether behind him, and slipped on the hand- him in a pair of steel handcuffs, what hope any fear of their giving way. But now he was just as anxious to prove them weak as generally he had been to find that they could not be defied.

He tried, first to slip his hands through and now that this outrage had been visited them, and if they had been put on at all loosely he might have succeeded in this atthem down relentlessly, and that they would | tempt, for his hands were supple and small, spend a large portion of their lives in the and the knuckles were very little larger Penitentiary if he were ever permitted to see around than his wrists. But they were a little larger, and as the handcuffs had been drawn so tightly around his wrists as al-

"No use trying that!" was his decision, after about five minutes of struggling, during which he cut his hands painfully, with-The first thing to be done was to find out out making the handcuffs give way in the

As has been said, he possessed great So he walked as straight as he could in one strength in his hands, and had a way of "What a wild-cat she is!" growled Billy. direction, but slowly and cautiously. He twisting people's hands so that they were "But, never mind. Keep watch over that noticed that there was a damp smell more rendered helpless at once. The same power there door," he commanded one of the men pronounced than would exist in an ordinary that made him such a formidable foe might who had not yet taken an active part in the cellar, and he was not surprised when he be turned to good advantage now that he struggle with the detective. "I'll attend to suddenly found himself walking in about a had no human being to contend with. If he could twist a man's hand so that the bones would crack if he did not yield, why with Kate Fairleigh with a curious smile, as A few steps further, and he stumbled over should he not be able to make the stubborn

Thus he argued, and he was determined place, and he knew it, but it was not his force enough to throw him over it head-first, to make his point if it was possible by any amount of exertion.

He put his two hands close together so that he could clasp his fingers, and then, was not easy for him to pick himself up, exerting all his strength he tried to turn hampered as he was by the handcuffs, but the handcuffs one against the other. They were too strong. He thought he felt a slight give in the right handcuff, but before he could follow up the advantage—if he had gained any—he was compelled to cease his efforts for a moment, on account of the intense pain.

"I don't care. I must get them off. Now

Again he bent all his energies to his seemfrom his prison. He moved about for nearly ingly hopeless task, and this time he was The detective appeared to be very much half an hour, before he was able to estimate sure that he had started something on his square, and that one of the big sewer mains he had broken one of the cogs that held the passed through it. What the cellar had been | right handcuff in place. At the same time "You think you are l'arning all about the used for originally he could not tell, but he the iron tand around his wrist gave way a little, and became a little looser on his wrist than before. Had his wrist not become swollen by the tugging and straining to which he had already subjected it, he might have slipped it off now. As it was, he knew that he must break off at least another cog before he could release himself.

"But you are getting there, all the same, Bob Corden," he whispered, as the perspiration poured down his face from his terrible exertions. "If you can break one, you can break some more, and you will show those rascals up-stairs that they have not called me the Twister for nothing."

He braced himself for a supreme effort, and with an almost herculean effort, he twisted his hands in opposite directions, with the result that there was a more pronounced click than before, and the band on his right wrist became so loose that he knew he had broken at least two more of the teeth of the handcuff, and he shook it off with a cry of triumph that he could not repress.

His right hand was free!

It was comparatively easy for him to get had been eaten away with rust at one spot, off the other one now, because he could grasp it with his right hand in such a way as to have an immense leverage, besides having the advantage of his hands being in front instead of behind him.

"So, Mr. Billy the Bowler, here is the first step toward getting out of your clutches. Now, take care you do not get into mine. Cool Bob, the Twister, is a dangerous man to such as you so long as his hands are not fastened!"

He shook his fist at the darkness over his head, just as a rattle told him that something was being done by his enemies.

He had just time to place his hands behind him, so they would appear to be still handcuffed, when a stream of light poured upon him momentarily, as the sliding trap came down with a thud, and flew to its place again.

The light had been apparent for a mere instant, but it was long enough for him to see that some one else had been cast into this awful dungeon, and that that person was Kate Fairleigh.

CHAPTER VIII. HUNTER AND HUNTED.

WE must go back to the time when Alexander Vantine left the bank, to get a cab, leaving Peter, the watchman, and his son Walter, to wait for his return.

For the first few minutes after the departure of the banker, the watchman had stood looking down at the young man, who had fallen back upon the sofa, in the stupor from which his father had managed to partly arouse him.

"It's a queer proceeding all around," was Peter's savage reflection as he pulled the overcoat of the young man over him a little better, for the morning was chilly, even in the bank, where there were steam-pipes to combat the cold that one must expect in February.

Peter went to the front door and looked out into the dark, quiet streets, and then, shaking his head to express his failure to understand the events of the night, he was just in the act of closing the door when some one hit him in the stomach, and he doubled up like a jack-knife. Then a pair of hands seized him by the collar, and plunged headlong down the iron steps. His head struck the pavement with a crash, and he knew no more.

"So much for him, my tear," exclaimed Morris Cohen, for it was he whose head had to get mixed up with this business so badly one, evidently. come in contact with the watchman's stomach, and it was his hands that had grasped Peter by the collar and pulled him down. "Now for the rest of the job." · He ran into the bank, followed by Guttersnipe, and the two shook Walter Vantine on us."

until he opened his eyes and looked vacantly into the face of the Jew.

The young man was still under the influence of the drug, but he recognized Morris Cohen, without realizing where he was, or how unlikely it was that the Jew could be in the bank at that time in the morning for any lawful purpose.

"Come on, my tear. The Serpent's waiting for us. We are going to have lots of

"I don't want any more fun. I am tired," muttered Walter Vantine, closing his eyes, and composing himself for another nap on lessly, as he saw two figures at the corner of bed."

The Jew shook his fist nervously at the young man, and Guttersnipe emitted a chuckle | talking to? This looks like a regular plant, over Morris's discomfiture.

"Hully chee! Ain't this a treat! Morris, I guess you'll have to carry him, if you are going to get him out of this."

"I'll break every bone in your body, you imp, if you don't keep your mouth shut!" hissed the Jew, as he shook Walter again, so violently that he sat up on the sofa and looked full into the face of Cohen.

"Whaat are you bothering me for, Morris?

I told you I was tired."

the Serpent is if you get him mad vonce. I think you'd better come."

This hint had the desired effect. The young man's addled brain could not comprehend anything clearly, but he knew in- | banker himself. Vell, this is nice," was the stinctively that he was in the power of Jim | Jew's mental observation. "What a young Daly, the Serpent, and he felt that he must | rascal! Oh, the wickedness of this world. not offend him, or the consequences would | And I was trying to bring him up like my probably be serious for himself, wherever he own son. Vell, I'll fix him when I do get might be.

He stood up, mechanically buttoned his overcoat and picked up his hat from the floor where it had fallen, and suffered the Jew to lead him to the door and out into the street, apparently without knowing or caring where he was or where he might be

"Hully chee! He's in a funny state," squeaked Guttersnipe. "I don't believe he knew he was in the bank at all."

"Shut up!" whispered Morris, fiercely, in the boy's ear. "Vhat do you vant to talk about the bank for?"

That there was reason for this apprehension on the part of the Jew was proved now, when the young man, stopping on the iron steps, said, with a desperate effort to realize his surroundings:

"What's that about the bank, Morris? When are we going to the bank? I'll have to hurry, or I shall never be there in time in the morn-

"Of course you vill, my tear," answered | well." Serpent, to have a little talk with him, and | afore he has any more birthdays." don't you see."

"All right," responded the young man, wearily, as he walked along by the side of lips of the young man. the Jew to the nearest station of the Third | "All right. Come with me."

drug to him in the cab.

"Here he is, mother," said Morris, half an hour later, as he entered the back room of | guide. the Baxter street store, and, with a dismal attempt at joviality, forced Walter Vantine Serpent."

with an oath, ran to the door.

"V'at's the matter, my tear son?"

that the police vill surely nab him some it. Now he has gone, and I shouldn't von- full information. der if he has gone to bring the police down through the store.

"V'ere are you going?" asked his mother, as Morris, tearing open the door, ran I'll bet fifty-no, five-dollars."

the grim reply, as Morris bounced out of the | himself. house and closed the front door with a bang.

He looked up and down the street, but not a soul was to be seen. Then he made his thoroughfare, at a swift pace, keeping his eyes open, and looking up the cross streets as he passed them. "There he is, sure," he exclaimed, breathtersnipe. "What's he doing and who's he his vision. must have run straight away to this feller as | fire. Oh, what ingratitude!" soon as he got down to the street."

He made up his mind that he must see who the boy was talking to, and what he was saying, so, creeping into the shadow of the houses as well as he could, he got near enough to catch a few fragments of the conversation. .

"I tell yer I know de mugs as I'm talking "Vell, do as you like. But you know what about," he heard the boy say. "Dey've got your son, an' dey won't be nothin' left of him if you don't do something, and moughty sudden, too." "S'help me, if he ain't a-talking to the him home!"

He listened again, and the banker asked where his son was, to which Guttersnipe replied:

"I can tell you where he is, but hully chee, it won't do you no good. See? Dem mugs knows too much for a swell cove like you. But you can get him if you do what I tells yer."

"The police-" began the banker.

"De police," interrupted Guttersnipe. with extreme contempt. "Do you t'ink dem fellers down in Baxter street wouldn't have everything all cleaned out of the way if de police was to make a raid on 'em? Why, dey's always watching de police, just as much as de police watches dem, and it's nip and tuck between dem all de time. No, you'll have to work dis yer' racket yerself if you are going to make it a go, and you hear me crying."

"Can you lead me to the place thrt they have taken my son? If you do, I'll pay you

Morris, reassuringly, as he dragged him | "I don't want no pay. I likes the young down the steps, and turned him so that his feller, see? And I am down on that old glance would not fall upon the form of sheeny, Morris Cohen. He t'inks he has me Peter, the watchman, lying insensible at the | dead ter rights. Well, I'll show him an' de foot of them. "Ve are just going to see the oder mugs where he has made a mistake

then you can go home, like a good little boy, 'Do it your own way, only do it," answered the banker, who was rather tired of the volume of slang that issued from the avenue "L" Road, and plodded up the Guttersnipe moved quickly down the stairway with the same air of not knowing | Bowery, and Morris Cohen had only just where he was going that had characterized | time to slip into the doorway of a store to him since the Serpent had administered the avoid being seen. The banker hesitated for a moment, and then, without a thought about Barney Doran, followed his youthful

The Jew came out of the doorway and watched them. Then he took a few steps into an old arm-chair. "He wants to see the as if he would follow them, but changed his mind and stopped.

"Does he, my tear son? Vell, so he shall, "What's the use?" he muttered. "So some day. I'm glad you found him. But long as I know he isn't going to the police v'ere's Snipe? He went out with you." I don't care. He'll be around to the crib The Jew stared in his mother's face for a pretty soon, with the old man, too, and I can moment with a blank expression, and then, take care of them when they come. Everything vas all right."

He chuckled in a wheezy way, and was "Matter? Vell, I'll tell you v'at's the about to retrace his steps toward Baxter matter. I don't trust that young man. I street when he observed Barney Doran standtook him with me now because I want him | ing about on the corner, looking for some

The Jew was as sharp as a needle and time. I don't think he's straight vith us. he comprehended what Barney was after as That's v'at the matter, if you want to know | surely as if Barney himself had given him

"That's that Irish cabman. What is he doing here? He ought to be in bed up in the 'Tenderloin.' He's in with that old man,

Morris Cohen was a thrifty gentleman, "To bring him back-alive or dead!" was | and he never bet large amounts, even with

He watched Barney moving uneasily about, and had about decided that it did not much matter what Barney did, so long as he could way to the Bowery and walked up that not interfere with the Jew's plans, when he caught sight of another figure that made him start and give vent to a half-stifled

"Vell, if that ain't the vorst I ever saw!" Morris could hardly believe his eyes, and the sofa. "Tell the Serpent I have gone to a street, one of them being that of a boy he rubbed them with his dirty handkerchief whom he recognized at once at that of Gut- most vigorously, in the hope of assisting

"It's her, sure enough, and she was gofor the kid was behind me when we came ing to talk to that fellow. Vell, it's time down the stairs from the Elevated, and he for me to act, or all the fish will be in the

> He kept well within the shadow of the houses, as the figure, which was that of a woman, passed him swiftly, going toward Barney Doran.

It was Kate Fairleigh!

She had come back to give some information to the banker, possibly a warning, and she was looking straight ahead, without observing the Jew, who came sneaking out of his doorway, so close to her that he could almost have touched her by stretching forth his hand.

"Where did he go, I wonder?" muttered the girl, looking in all directions in the hope of seeing the banker. "That is the worst of men. They never will do as they are told. If he had stayed right here, or gone into the hotel, I could have found him when I wanted him. But now-"

At this instant she caught sight of Barney Doran, staring about him in a mystified manner, and she quickened her steps to catch up to him and ask where the banker was.

But fate was at her elbow in the shape of the Jew, and she never reached Barney. Something flashed past her, and the next moment a handy-billy was swung in the air, and came down on poor Barney's head, knocking him senseless.

Kate turned to run as she saw Morris patting his weapon approvingly, but she reckoned without her host. He had his eye on her, although he appeared to be so careless, and just as she turned to go away he seized her roughly by the arm as he hissed in her car:

"Not yet, my tear. You have been trying to blow the gaff on the gang, and that settles you. I'm glad I met you now, or with him hefore I thought about your comthere might have been more trouble for all of | ing back."

The girl shook off the Jew's grasp, as she looked him in the face with eyes that were fairly blazing with excitement, and said:

"Keep away from me, Morris Cohen. I am in the open street now, and I'm not afraid of you, nor of Rachel, either. If you put your hand on me again, I'll call for help."

"Vill you?" sneered the Jew. "And what good would that do you? It would put you in the Tombs, vouldn't it? And ve vould have plenty of good reliable witnesses at the trial to svear that you were mixed up in a lot of rather bad jobs, and they vould railroad you to Sing Sing right avay. Yes, call for help, my tear!"

Kate recognized the force of the Jew's words, and when he seized her by the arm, and dragged her down the Bowery in the direction of Baxter street, she did not offer any resistance.

CHAPTER IX.

MOTHER RACHEL'S FALSE MOVE.

IF Morris Cohen thought Guttersnipe intended to go straight to the Baxter street crib he was very much mistaken. The boy sufficiently to make up to you for all the slipped away from Morris when they deseended from the Elevated Road, and he knew perfectly well that when the Jew laid his hands on him it would be a painful mo ment for the boy.

young man, Walter Vantine, was in the whin they brought him into the police-Baxter street place, and that if the banker station on a stretcher, after a shindy wid the wanted to see his son now, he would have to go there.

two went swiftly down the Bowery, and then | beginning to break, and the black darkness turned off so that they could pass down Park Row, toward the Battery, "it wouldn't do you any good to find yer son, if you was eaught, too. An' I'm tellin' yer de gang wouldn't care two cents whether you liked | the night itself. it or not if dey once got yer down in dere cellar, where dey has de young feller by dis time."

"What shall we do, then?" asked the banker, impassively, although it would not have been very difficult to detect that he was laboring under terrible excitement under his cool exterior.

response of the boy.

The banker did not answer, but after walking a few steps further he stopped suddenly and looked around.

"What's de matter?" asked Snipe.

"I forgot something." "What? Yer pocketbook?"

"No. Barney Doran." "Who's Barney Doran? Yer don't mean de mug what drives de cab at night, do yer?"

"Yes. You know him?"

cousins. I have taught him to play tenpins. But where is he?"

me. He went to the livery-stable to put | not followed, for, taking the banker's hand till he came back. But I met you, and for- | Barney Doman, he suddonly deated through got all about him." I'm tellin' yer. I'd not go back on a pard- the docks.

ner that way, you can bet." banker smile, but la did not answer, only parently into the water.

turned and went back over the road they had traveled. It was not necessary to go very far. They had only just reached the Bowery, when they saw Barney hustling toward them at a great rate.

"Dere he is," said the boy, "an' comin' as if he had the whole police force of the precinct at his heels. Hello, Barney!" he cried, at the top of his voice.

and Snipe seized his hand and shook it with a great deal of earnestness.

"Cull, I'm glad ter see yer," he exclaimed, with a heartiness that left no doubt his sincerity.

"I must apologize for not waiting for you, Barney," said the banker, "but I met this young man, who said he could lead me to my miserable boy, and I walked away claimed Barney. "It's meself is wishing and called down the hole! you had shtopped for a little phwile, 'cause yez moight heve caught the shpalpeen that gave me the tap on the head with his shtick a phwile ago. Sure, me head feels as if it was big enough for two, so it does."

"Who struck yer, Barney?" asked Snipe. "If it was any of de gang, an' I find it out, I'll make them sick, or my name ain't Guttersnipe."

"I'm sorry you were attacked, Barney. They did not rob you, did they?" asked the banker.

"Sorra a bit of it. Nothing was done but a rap on my bead with a shtick or a blackjack that seemed to weigh about a ton. I shuppose I ought to feel glad that they did not take all my wealth, but be the same token I only had a few dollars in me pocket, an' they could have had them and welcome, if they had not played the divil's tattoo on me skull."

"Well, so long as you are not seriously hurt, it is not so bad. And when I find my son, I will take care that you are rewarded business."

old father, who was on the police foorce, At the same time the lad knew that the saving yer honor's presence, used to say, "Dead Rabbit" gang on the Bowery."

While talking the three had been walking "But, you see, cull," he observed, as the swiftly down-town. The dawn was just had given place to a gray atmosphere that was cheerful because it indicated that daylight was not far away, although in itself it was more gloomy than the darkness of Guttersnipe knew his way perfectly, and there was no hesitation in his march to- | lers think of it? Ain't it out of sight?" ward and down Wall street, which was the way he took his two companions.

"I have brought you de longest way 'round," he explained, "'cause we don't want ter be followed, an' if we had gone straight to de place, dere is no tellin' who "Do as I tells yer," was the sententious might have been after us. I know dem mugs too well ter trust 'em."

> At last they reached the foot of Wall street, and saw the East River with its many craft moving mistily about in the early morning and heard the occasional warning bells of ferry-boats and other small vessels, while over all the outlines of the great bridge could be discerned faintly in the semi-darkness.

But Guttersnipe was not troubling him-- If almust the e far illian sights and sounds. He was anxious to get to his mystudious "Do I know him?" repeated Guttersnipe, destination without being seen by any of with sareastic emphasis. "Well, I should his regular companions, and he was very dance a jig. Why, him and me is almost suspicious that they might be somewhere in the vicinity, and be ready to pounce upon libra act ceres missies ent.

"I lett him at the corner where you met lie was satisfied at her that they were la pair of heavy sates that were partly open, "I don't t'ink any more of you for dat, and led the way to the extremity of one of

"Come on," he said softly, and then dis The earnestness of the lad made the appeared over the ed e of the dark, ap-

"Be the powers he has tumbled into the wather!" exclaimed Barney, in considerable excitement, while the banker stood still, in his usually impassive manner, awaiting further developments.

The two men did not know what to do, because it was too dark to see any object floating in the river unless it happened to be within a few feet of the dock, and they Barney came running up, out of breath, had not seen a sign of Snipe after he had fallen or jumped off the dock. But they were relieved of their anxiety in an unexpected manner.

The flooring of the dock was of old timber, eaten away in many places, and revealing holes large enough for a man's foot to fall through. Up one of these holes was thrust a stick, that gave Barney Deran a rather severe poke.

"Mutherin' Michaelmas! What's that?" A laugh in the tones of Guttersnipe was "Be the ghost of McCarty's cat!" ex- | the response, and then Barney stooped down

"Is that yerself, Snipe?" "Yes. Come down."

"Coom down, is it?" An' how am Oi to git down. Sure Oi don't see no space big enough to let a kitten down, let alone a stout, hearty man loike meself, ter say nothin' of Muster Vantoine here,"

"Oh, tumble to yourself. Here's a hole big enough to let a regiment of fellers your size come through," replied Snipe, as he poked the stick up in another place, where there was a space in the flooring that bore out his declaration.

In another minute Barney Doran and Alexander Vantine were in a small apartment that, while not luxurious, was at least comfortable. It was made apparently of a number of large packing-cases, hammered together in a rough way by some one with a pretty good idea of carpentering, so that it formed a sort of room about six, feet in height, and about ten feet square. A small oil stove was set in the middle of this unique apartment, and there was a box at one end, which when opened by Guttersnipe was altogether too sharp for that. He had pain and annoyance you have had over this with a key that he produced from beneath a loose plank attached to the dock, outside "Well, include, sorr, it 'u'd hove ter be a the room, revealed a partly-consumed boiled very bad crack on me head that would not ham, a loaf of bread, three cups, salt, butbe fixed up wid a greenback plaster, as me | ter and other conveniences of housekceping. At the further end of the room was a mattress, such as is brought over by emigrants in the steerage of Atlantic steamers, and several gray blankets, that appeared to have come in the same way. A lamp on another box, that was evidently intended to serve as a table, and that Guttersnipe had lighted before inviting his companions down, gave ample illumination to the hiding-place.

"Now, yer see, I jist close this door, and bolt it inside, and no one can come in upon me without knocking or breakin' de door down," observed Snipe, with evident pride in his arrangements. "What do youse fel-

"It certainly is—literally," answered the banker, gravely. "I do not think it would be possible for any one to find this place unless they were guided to it. But now, what is the object in bringing me here?"

"I'll tell yer," answered the boy. "I've took a fancy to your son, 'cause I can see that de gang wants ter git him into trouble, if dey hasn't already, an' I'm going to give away dere tricks sure as I'm here. Now. Kate Fairleigh is a good, square gal. She has been brought inter de gang against her will, and she hasn't never done nothin' dat de police could catch her for."

"Yes, well?" interrupted the lander.

rather impatiently. "Don't be in a hurry, and you'll git done all de quicker," observed Guttersnipe, with cil nity "I'm tellin dissieny." Mr. Vantine would like to have given the boy a sharp reply, but he realized that thu youngster had the best of the situation, and that nothing could be gained by making him arery, so he waited to let the lev precent

" As I was savin', Kate is a geed girl, mul a fried of mine She brows dat ballers away his horse and cab, and I was to wait to guide him, and cheely followed by try to be square, and that depant do not like me ente di la compita dell'action la l'apportente ter des Whitehover dev asks me. But dev is slick, year to and devictions my Leart air tim it " " Be the bridge of Bally comm, why den't yez biren hall?" put in Barney.

"Silence, Irish!" replied the importurishle Snipe. "I'm doing dis. I'd have you here, and I'll git around de Baxter street crib till I have the whole gang there within an hour, meet Kate. Den I'll git her to bring de as Snipe very well knew. young mug around here, and you can make what 'rangements you like ter nab de whole gang, for I s'pose dat is what you mean ter do you want her?" do. It would not do fer me ter try ter get your son up ter your bank or where you lives, or de gang 'u'd be after him so quick ! dat dere wouldn't be any fun in it."

The banker could not understand exactly why he was brought to this place, or what the boy meant, but he was not the sort of man to ask many questions, so long as he saw that he was on his way to attain his desires. So he took everything just as it followed by another.

Collic.

"Hark!" whispered the boy, in an agitated whisper, as he turned down the lamp.

this be that had found his way to the secret and what Guttersnipe did will be revealed plan to rob the bank—if there is any such stronghold of the boy—a stronghold whose in a future chapter. existence he had never revealed to another soul, until this morning, when he had CHAPTER X. brought Alexander Vantine and Barney Doran to it.

last Snipe made up his mind that there was ters. Alexander Vantine had been at the There was a touch of quiet rebuke in the only one thing to be done, which was to open bank all day, attending to his business in his tone in which Mr. Harris said this, that might be.

done so, than it was burst open, and in 'that he did not want to hear anything about '' What would you advise me to do then?" tumbled—Rachel Cohen, the old woman it. All he wanted was for Peter to go home asked the banker, after a pause, during vas to see yer Ve thought you vas lost, dered, but had obeyed, unquestioningly, ter was obliged to look down at the tableand Morris he is almost vild about you. which was what Alexander Vantine required | cloth in some confusion. But I thought I would find you. You vas of all his employees.

MILITY boy. "I don't like you as much as you do, cussion of the affairs of the bank were strict. "That is satisfactory so far as it goes. an' I don't propose to have you slobberin' yer inter de river "

hag, as she hugged him tighter, and at the ander Vantine was sitting in his handsome same time gave him a vicious pinch on the library in his Fifth avenue residence, calmly cheek that made him howl with pain.

But Barney Doran, who after turning up was seated opposite to him. mattress at the other end of the room.

hand.

river.

"Look out, Barney," said the banker, calmly. "She is going to stab you."

"Oh, the old she divil," was Barney's response. "Look at her!"

The old woman threw herself upon him, but he was prepared, and in a moment had wrenched the knife out of her hand, and forced her down upon the mattress again, holding her there.

the river," said Barney sternly, and his man-; was only to suggest that they go down to sonification of laziness, and locked the door. ner was so impressive that the old woman dinner.

she'll bring de whole gang down on us. She would have given a good deal to know what | "I see these windows look down into the must have followed us to see which way was passing in the mind of his father. As back yard, from which it would be easy for room and revealed a cupboard, in which venting some noted criminal were fishing-tackle and other rubbish. Sev- A livericd servant entered the room with a eral holes were bored in the wooden wall card on a salver, taking no notice of the look | walked all around the rorm, to see that near the top, to let in air, but nothing could of indignation east upon him by the butler, be seen through them except the piles that 'who always resented any sign of interruption supported the dock, the cupboard being at of the sacred institution of dinner. the end nearest shore, and not facing the "What is that, Stone?" asked the banker,

The old woman watched him as he opened - this door and looked into it, and seemed to divine his purpose, for she made a sudden bolt for the outer door, and but for the promptitude of Barney Doran, who caught her just as she was going through, she would lave got out, and that would have been the lattof this secret rendezvous, for she would

Barney, with a grin. "Here, Snipe, where | banker, he looked so much like him. The

"Right here!"

"All right. Here she is!"

Before she could make any particular re she was as helpless as if she had been walled | Harris." up in a tomb.

She kicked and yelled with all her powers, but no one took any notice of her, and in another ten minutes there was no one in the Doran, who threw himself upon the mat- or Serpent, is concerned in it?" tress, and dropped into a sleep so sound "You are not right, Mr Vantine," answer-There was a light tap upon the door, that it would have taken a dozen Mother ed the stranger, in low, deliberate tones, that Rachels to disturb him.

IN THE SERPENT'S COILS The tapping continued at the door, and at ing the events narrated in the preceding chap- | successful, Mr. Vantine." come into the bank at nine o'clock, and was | than Alexander Vantine feel rather small.

"Let me go, Mother Cohen," screamed the say anything about them. Unnecessary dis | they do." around me. Git out of here, or I'll t'row penalty of an infringement of his rules was | banker. discharge, prompt and uncompromising.

"Oh, v'at an ungrateful boy!" croaked the Now, at five o'clock in the evening, Alex-

the lamp, had been watching this perform. What was said need not be repeated in de- day to make the excellent cuisine of Mr. ance with a doubtful gaze, as if he did not tail. The sum and substance of Walter Van- Vantine particularly enjoyable. Like a tigress, she sprung to her feet, and 'in Baxter street, with a man named Morris | versation with your son." this time she had a gleaming knife in her Cohen, with whom he was slightly acquainted, talking to him about the ball, and asking him whether he had not better go home."

"And then you came home?"

"Yes, sir."

"At what time?"

"It was ten o'clock when I looked at my | not to disturb us?" watch in my own room, before undressing and going to bed."

"Um!"

"Now, you sit still, or I'll throw you in minutes before he spoke again, and then it in which he had been lolling, the very per-

"Now, here's more of it," remarked the handsomely-appointed dining-room, with a brocaded curtains, looked out, carefully closboy. "We'll have to keep her here, or staid butler waiting upon them, and Walter ing the curtains again. we was going, but I do not think any of de well might be have desired to know what any one to climb over the wall into the alley, others know where dis crib is." Inspector Byrnes was thinking about when and thence gain the street," he observed, He opened a small door at the end of the he was planning some scheme for circum- casually.

glanced carelessly in the direction of the footman,

"He said as 'ow I was to bring 'is card to 'im, even if you was at dinner, sir."

The banker looked at the card, and a slight flush overspread his stern countenance. "Quite right. Bring him here."

The servant bowed, and almost immediately ushered in an elderly man, who-"Phwata wicked ould woman!" exclaimed | might have been the twin brother of the banker signed to the two servants to with draw, and looked inquiringly at his visitor

"I see by your card that you are a member of Inspector Byrnes's secret force, Mr.sistance. Mother Rachel was in the little Mr.—" He looked at the card to read the cupboard, with the door shut upon her, and | name, and completed his sentence. "Mr

The stranger bowed.

"What have you learned about this affair? Am I right in supposing that there is to be an attempt made upon the bank to night, and room to listen to her noise, except Barney | that this notorious bank thief, Jim Daly, caused Walter Vantine to start, involuntari-Guttersnipe was nonplused. Who could The banker went straight to the bank, ly. "The Serpent is not concerned in the plan, which I doubt."

> "Who are the people, then? You police always like to be so mysterious when you have any thing in hand."

Ir was five o'clock in the evening follow. I "If we were not, we should seldom be the door, and take his chances on who it usual calm, self-possessed way. Peter had would have made any less dignified man Cautiously he unbolted the door and open- about to explain his absence from the bank, Walter Vantine had not said a word, but ed it a little way. But he had no sooner but Mr. Vantine had shut him off, and told him he was listening eagerly to the conversation.

whom Morris Cohen called mother. and go to bed, and be ready for duty the which Mr. Harris had fixed his gaze upon "So, there you are, my boy! How glad I following night. At which Peter had won. the young man's face so earnestly that Wal-

"Nothing. There is no likelihood of anyalways a favorite of mine." The officials of the bank had not noticed thing being attempted for some weeks, if at. She stretched out her arms as she spoke, any undue excitement or disturbance in the all, and I have the men who would under and drew Snipe into her embrace, but with manner of their chief, and if they had heard take the job—if it ever is undertaken—so rather more force than he considered neces- anything about the episodes in the bank the completely under surveillance, that they cannight before, they were too well-trained to not stir without my knowing everything ly forbidden by Alexander Vantine, and the You have dined, Mr. Harris?" asked the

"Not yet, Mr. Vantine."

The banker touched the handbell and ordered a plate for Mr. Harris, who fell to without ceremony and ate with the manner interrogating his son, Walter Vantine, who of a man who appreciated a good dinner, and who had breakfasted early enough in the know just what to make of it, took a hand; tine's story was that he had been to the "And now, Mr. Vantine," said Mr. Harris, in now, and clutching the old woman by the French ball at the Academy of Music the | coolly, as he lighted a cigar, at the conclushoulder, pulled her away with such force as night before, had taken too much wine, and sion of the dinner, and leaned back in the to swing her around until she fell on the did not remember anything till he found him- easy-chair his host had insisted upon hisself in a dirty parlor behind a clothing store | taking, "I should like a little private con-

> "Certainly, Mr. Harris. I think it would be well. I will go to the library. I have some correspondence to attend to. When you have finished your interview I should like to see you, before you go."

"Very well. Will you tell your servants.

"Yes," answered Mr. Alexander Vantine, as he left the room.

No sooner had the banker disappeared, The banker sat thinking for at least ten | than Mr. Harris arose quickly from his chair, Then he went to the two windows, one afwas convinced he meant what he said. The father and son sat at dinner in the ter the other, and, pulling aside the heavy

"Yes," said Walter.

Mr. Harris was not yet satisfied. He there was no other means of egress or ingress, or places through which any one outside could spy upon him. He found that there was another door, opposite that by as he held a glass of claret to the light, and | which he had entered, and that it gave upon stairs leading to the kitchen department. It was evidently not often used, for when he turned the key he found the lock was rusty. you, sir, 'cause he was sure you would see and having unlocked it and looked out, he locked it again, and was quite satisfied that there would be no interference from that quarter, while the heavy portieres in front of it made it impossible for any one to peep in.

The folding-doors that communicated with the front room were fastened on the diningroom side, and they, too, were vailed by thick, heavy hangings,

Having completed the survey of the apartment, and satisfied himself that their privacy was complete, Mr. Harris returned to his chair, and taking his cigar from his mouth, removed his iron-gray whiskers, wig and eye-glasses, and revealed the countenance of Jim Daly, alias the Serpent.

Walter Vantine did not betray any surprise.

"This is rather a bold thing to do, isn't it?" he asked, quietly.

"Perhaps so. But it suited me to do it," replied the Serpent, taking up his cigar old gentleman knows how to choose good his chest he was utterly helpless. eigars. I wonder if he would tell Mr. Harris where they can be procured. I never smoked any like them before that I can re- | the young man, as he fumbled with his left member."

"They are imported specially for him." "Ah! That's the advantage of being rich. One can eat, drink and smoke whatever he chooses, without caring what it costs."

"Now, Serpent, what do you want?" asked Walter Vantine, suddenly sitting up in his chair and leaning forward. , "You did not come here to talk about cigars, I suppose?"

"Not altogether. I have another purpose in view. Did you recognize me through my disguise?" "Immediately."

"So I thought. But it does not matter, so long as the old gentleman did not suspect that I was any other than Mr. Harris, of the secret police service. He is a smart man, your father, but he is not a match for the Serpent yet. By the way, Walter, I have a check on the Vantine bank—a check supposed to be signed by Alexander Vantine. It is for five hundred dollars."

Walter Vantine turned pale.

"Then it was not a dream?" he moaned. "Hardly. I have the check, and I am going to present it at the bank to-morrow morning, as soon as the bank opens, unless-"

"What?" interrupted Walter Vantine, eagerly.

The Serpent knocked the ashes from his cigar and inhaled the smoke two or three present the check for $500 at the bank, even times with an air of intense enjoyment ere | if I do sign that confession?" he answered, slowly:

ments."

"What do you mean?"

and went to the door and listened. Then he | tine bank, payable to "Cash," and signed came back to his chair and settled himself by Alexander Vantine. comfortably, looking at the other with a smile, but without speaking.

demanded Walter, clinching his fist in his agony.

"Just this," answered Jim Daly, with more carnestness than he had shown hither- | the confession. to. "You know that the gang mean to get into your father's bank. They do not want very much-two or three hundred thousand dollars. But they mean to have that--" rising from his chair.

"Scoundrel!" interrupted Walter, half- | ger and thumb in the process.

You can call for the servants, and have me opened it, but not before Jim Daly had the house, after a while, if you think it ad- | The footman, Stone, was at the door. you, and you should not care very much library as soon as convenient." about him."

exclaimed Walter.

you interrupt me again, I will show it to with his head sunk upon his breast, the picyour father before I leave this house, and ture of dejection. you know what that will mean for you. The door closed, and Walter was buried You must go with me, and show me the in a reverie that was as near despair as could led to liberty?" combination of the vault in the Vantine be imagined. Bank."

"I don't know the combination."

"Don't lie, Walter. It is a bad habit. You do know the combination. I have assured myself on that point already."

"And suppose I do. Do you think I will the coolest raseals I ever met with." be a party to a robbery of my own father's bank? The idea is preposterous!"

"Better than going to Sing Sing for for-mercy." "Which will mean the Tombs, a trial, a conviction, and seven years of hard labor. I have that forged check, you know!"

As he uttered this last sentence, in the tone of easy banter that he had used all through the conversation, Walter Vantine could restrain himself no longer. He sprung upon the Serpent, and with his right hand clutching his throat, threw him to the floor and planted his knee in his tormentor's chest.

The attack was so sudden that the Serpent, strong as he was, could not save himself again, and puffing it contentedly. "The from falling, and when Walter knelt upon

> "Now, Jim Daly, I will have that check from you, or I'li choke you to death!" hissed hand inside the other's coat.

But by this time the Serpent had recovered himself, and with a powerful effort he threw the young man off as if he had been a baby, and stood looking at him contemptuously, straightening his necktie and coat the while.

"Walter, you are a worse fool than I took you for. I have come here for a certain purpose, and that purpose I will carry out.

Will you do as I ask you, or not?"

Walter Vantine was thinking, while the Serpent, lighting another cigar, resumed his seat in the easy-chair, and watched him narrowly, a slight smile playing about the corners of his lips, under the dyed mustache. In a few moments Walter brought his fist down heavily on the table, and said:

" I will do it!"

The Serpent grasped his hand.

"You will?"

"Yes."

"Good! Now, sign this paper."

he bargained for. He looked hastily over know it." the document that the Serpent had laid upon that he had taken part in the robbery of the last night?" Vantine bank, the date being left blank.

"But, if I sign that, I shall be in your power completely."

that you will keep your contract."

"And how do I know that you will not

The Serpent took out a pecketbook and earnestly. "Unless you and I make different arrange- produced a check, which he showed Walter "I thank you," said the girl, simply, "and The Serpent looked around the room again | Walter saw that it was a check on the Van- think from my associates."

Without another word he signed the paper, and held it till the Serpent handed him "What do you mean, you-you-devil?" the check. Neither would trust the other, and each held the two papers by either end, and let go of one at the same time. Then Walter had the check and the Serpent

> Walter looked closely at the check, and then held it over the flame of the lamp till it caught fire, allowing it to consume to ashes before he let go, although it singed his fin-

"Sit down, Walter. Don't get excited. door, and Walter quickly unlocked and have?"

"I am ready now. Show me the way," derment at him. "Stop! I will not listen to any more!" said the Serpent, in dignified tones. As he

How long he would have remained so it is impossible to say, but he was recalled to a not recognize, saving:

"Excuse me, but that Serpent is one of concealed the door, with the rusty lock, leading to the kitchen, a boyish-looking young "I will throw myself on my father's fellow, with a ruddy countenance, curly brown hair, and eyes that were as innocent in expression as those of a young girl.

"Who the deuce are you?" demanded

Walter, indignantly.

"My name is Robert Corden. I am a detective, and am known in New York as Captain Corden, or, by the crooks, as Cool Bob, the Twister!"

CHAPTER XI.

A DANGEROUS JOURNEY.

When Kate Fairleigh was dropped into the sub-cellar of the Baxter street house, the detective was in a more hopeful frame of mind than he had been before he had managed to rid himself of his handcuffs. As a consequence, he spoke in almost a cheerful tone, when he addressed Kate Fairleigh:

"What have they put you down here for?" The girl emitted a scream. She had supposed herself alone in this awful place, and when a human voice sounded near her ear it was perhaps not strange that she should be startled. But she was not a nervous girl, compared with other women, and she recovered herself immediately, as she put the very natural question; "Who are you?"

"Cool Bob." "The Twister."

"You know me, it seems?"

"By name? Yes. Who does not? That is, among the sort of people I have been forced to associate with nearly all my life."

"Well, Kate Fairleigh, the gang seem to have gone back on you this time, haven't they?"

"Yes, they suspect me of giving their schemes away."

"And are you guilty?"

"I am guilty to this extent, that I will Walter started back. Here was more than | not be a party of their villainy, and they

"And yet you tried to decoy that young the table, and saw that it was a confession | man, Walter Vantine, at the French ball,

> "Only to save him. That was the only reason, as I am a living woman!"

There was a momentary pause, and then "Exactly. I must have some security | the voice of the detective came out of the darkness:

"I believe you!"

Corden felt around in the gloom until he touched Kate's hand, which he clasped in the light of the table lamp, but too far if we ever get out of this place, I will prove away for the young man to grab at it. to you that I am not so bad as you might

"All right. You shall have the chance, I hope. But, in the mean time, how are we to get out of this?"

"There is only one way, and that is by being lifted out through the trap above. I mean, that we cannot escape until those wretches choose to let us out."

"I don't agree with you," said Corlett quietly.

"You don't know as much about this place as I do," returned the girl, sadh. "Here we are, in the black darkness, at 11 bottom of a well, and no outlet at all except the trap that is under the stove of the At this moment there was a knock at the kitchen over our heads. What hope can we

The detective took from his vest pellil turned over to the police, or kicked out of | hastily assumed his gray wig and whiskers | a patent cigar-lighter, in the shape | | fuse that burned with a small but steal visable. But hear what I have to say, first. 'Mr. Vantine's compliments to Mr. Har- flame after he had ignited it by twisting Your father has never been very kind to ris, and he would like to see him in the small silver button. The light showed dun the girl standing close to him, looking in wou

"Do you see that pipe over there?" ) followed the servant from the room, he asked, looking cautiously up to the trans "Oh, yes, you will! Sit down. I have looked back, and smiled triumphantly at the over his head, for he could never feel sum this check for five hundred dollars, and if young man, who had dropped into his chair, that some one might not be looking in I listening from the kitchen above.

"Yes." "Would you go through that pipe it !

"Liberty?" "Yes."

The girl hesitated, for she could sense of his surroundings by a voice he did understand exactly what the detection meant.

"Look," he went on, as he stepped our to the pipe and showed her a large hole ... Walter sprung to his feet, and there he | the pipe through which the water was tr saw, standing in front of the portieres that ling. "This pipe is eaten so badly by rus

I will make it bigger by giving it another | You must not mind them." kick."

result was that a very large piece of the iron she was, she had all a woman's horror of was broken off the rust-caten conduit in ad- | rats, and the mere thought of them, in such dition to that which had already been dis- la place, was almost enough to send her into placed. At the same instant a slight noise hysterics over his head made him turn his light out.

posed to be handcuffed, and if those fellows | was horrible!" were to find out that I have managed to get out of the bracelets, they might fix me in | never do to let the girl give way like this, some other way that would not be such an when there was such a strong likelihood of neither! easy thing for me."

"What do you propose?"

For answer, the detective took the girl's hand and led her to the pipe.

shall have to make our way along this water | sure that the rat is more afraid of you than Then, if we can get along that without even in a sewer. being drowned, we shall surely find an outlet somewhere."

swim," answered Kate quietly.

"Good! You are the sort of girl I admire. | in my flesh!" You have nerve, which is as useful to a woman as a man. Come along. I will go saying about the harmlessness of sewer rats first, and you keep hold of my coat and annoyed Corden still more, but fortunately follow."

the detective had planned, but it was necessary, and he did not hesitate. The water in | rat that touched her, and the tone in which the big cylinder was high enough to wet she said it indicated that she was mad, rather both of them thoroughly as they crawled than frightened, now. along on their hands and knees, while the atmosphere was not of the kind that is conducive to health.

clutches of the men who had no doubt made rats will cause us much trouble now." up their minds to kill him, as he felt sure. And he was right. They resumed their master of the expedition, and all that remain- | that might interfere.

leader.

with the dirty water swashing about them | now, and although the detective could hear and the iron pipe coming in contact with an ominous switch now and then that he their heads here and there when they in- knew was caused by a rat plunging into the cautiously raised themselves. It seemed like | water through which he and his companion a mile to Corden, but it was really only a were wading, he did not say anything about comparatively short distance, when he sud- it, but plodded on with the firm purpose of dealy found himself stopped by some iron | finding an outlet sooner or later. There hars, while a cooler gust of air told him that | were a number of twists and turns, and now He lad reached one of the huge mains that run under the city in all directions, but centually empty into one of the rivers.

Corden was pretty well acquainted with the underground geography of New York, and he had calculated to find these gratings here and there. He felt around the rating in the dark, and at last found the bolt that held it in place. To, move this back and open the grating was the work of a minute, and then he dropped into a large archway giving his hand to Kate to help her.

"What do you think of this trip?" asked the detective jocularly.

me light vein, "but I hope we shall get out some time."

"I hope so," responded the detective. understand?" "Being up to your waist in water is all right! But Kate did not answer. He felt her pattern, but sharpened to a point, and sup t Long Branch, in July, but I do not care grow heavier on his arm, and he caught her plied with a spring, so that when it was open or it in a main sewer in New York in around the waist in time to prevent her fall- it would not close again accidentally. February."

Kate was about to answer, and had already riven utterance to the words: "I don't think—" when she uttered a most piercing say," muttered Corden, who was as nearly | She did not waste any time, but set to water as if she were demented.

"What's the matter?" cried the detective, now?"

in alarm. "What has hurt you?"

"mmer, while clinging to him with all a place where it would probably need all the to thrust her hand through. her strength:

" Rats!"

The detective laughed, as he answered, that I have been able to kick a hole in it al- | sewers, and we are likely to meet a few hunmost large enough for one to crawl through. | dreds ourselves before we get out of this.

The girl shuddered, and it was plain that He suited the action to the word, and the she was on the verge of fainting. Brave as "It was a great, soft, crawling, twisting "It is all right," he whispered. "It was thing, and it came right on my shoulder," only some one moving a chair in the she said, in a broken whisper. "It put its kitchen. But, I am very careful. I would | mouth against my cheek, and I thought I not strike a light before because I am sup- | could feel its breath in my mouth. Oh! It

The detective was annoyed. It would their meeting so many more rats in their trip through the sewer. Something must be done to reassure her.

"All you have to do, when a rat comes pause and listen with more intentness than "You must not mind getting wet. We near you, is to knock it away. You may be he had betrayed at any other time since main, in the hope of striking the main pipe. | you of him. There is no danger from them,

As he spoke, the girl shrieked and clung closer to him.

"I am not afraid of getting wet, and I can | "Oh! One of them bit me on the arm!" she cried. "It made its teeth almost meet

This sudden disproval of what he was the infliction upon the girl of actual pain It was a perilous and unpleasant trip that | seemed to have a beneficial effect, for she declared forthwith that she would kill the next

The detective was a phitosopher and a close student of human nature, and he knew it was all right now.

But the detective did not expect it to be "Once let a woman get real mad," he particularly sweet, and he was prepared for muttered to himself, "and she will not allow some inconvenience in getting out of the anything to frighten her. I don't think the ed for her was to obey orders and follow her | For some time they were not annoyed any more by rats. The arched passageway For some yards they traveled, in this way, | through which they were passing was wider | the close atmosphere was broken by a rush of cooler air that told him they were getting near the river. He could not tell how far they had walked, but he knew that it was a great distance, considering the sort of place they were going through.

"Where is this to take us out?" asked the girl, at last, as she leaned heavily on the detective's shoulder.

"Not far," he answered, reassuringly.

"I can feel the air of the river."

"Because-I-I-am afraid-I-I-cannot go any further."

used. "You must go further. You can- again, in the same heartless tone. not stay here. It will mean death. Do you The something she had been looking for ing into the water at her feet. She have fainted!

"This is a pretty state of things I must | that was the character of Mother Rachel. be. "What in thunderation am I to do

It was indeed an awkward predicament was being thrust into the closet. But the girl was in too much terror to for the detective. Kate Fairleigh was a. The sharp blade went through the wood, ; ak for a moment, and it was only when good-sized girl, weighing perhaps one hun- and the old woman cut away at it till therethe detective had taken her hand and given dred and forty pounds, and it was no joke I r a gentle shake, that she managed to to have her, in an unconscious condition, in strength and activity of both of them to get them safely out of their dilemma.

He shook the girl violently, in the hope of with athletes when they have fainted from over-exertion. He bit her ear.

was to make the girl moan faintly, and then

The only result of this heroic treatment to drop into deep unconsciousness again. "Well, I don't know! She seems to be completely played out. And yet, I must get her out somehow. I suppose it is a case of carrying her. So here goes!" Captain Corden, although of rather slight. build, possessed the physique of a trained athlete, as we have stated, and it was small exertion for him to raise the young girl to his shoulder, so that she lay across it, with her head resting against his.

Then he bravely struggled on, through the water, determined to save both or

For a few yards he walked on, the load on his shoulder seeming to grow heavier as the minutes passed, and then something made him entering the sewer.

"It's coming, by George!" he exclaimed.

"Now, we are in for it."

The words were hardly out of his mouth, when, with a mighty roar, a great volume of water rushed toward him, and the next instant he and his companion were completely ingulfed in a flood that filled the archivay to the very top!

CHAPTER XII.

AN AWKWARD MEETING AVOIDED.

BARNEY DORAN was very tired, and when he dropped to sleep in the crib belonging to Guttersnipe it was with the determination of making his nap long enough to recruit his exhausted energies and make him ready for anything that might fall in his way when he awoke. He felt now that he was a fullfledged detective and he enjoyed the experience, in spite of the fact that it had been rather rough, and without any particular reward in view in the way of money.

But he was not to enjoy a long sleep. As for Kate, she had the feeling that it was journey, and Kate seemed determined to go | Mother Rachel had no idea of remaining shut none of her business. The detective was through, regardless of rats or anything else up in this little cupboard until some one chose to release her, and she applied all her energies to getting out.

The door was strong, and kick as she might at it, she could not make any more impression on it than to cause it to shake violently, with a noise that would have wakened Barney if he had not been so completely worn out.

She bit her lip in rage as she found herself powerless to move the door, and if any one could have seen her face they would have seen that it expressed a ferocity that is not pleasant on any face, and least of all on that of an elderly woman.

"The young imp of Satan! When I do get out of this, I'm thinking it won't be long before he is in the hands of the police, and then he won't get out again in a hurry. Morris has enough against all of them to hang the whole gang. And even if he hadn't, he could soon find evidence enough. Swearing in a court is an easy thing if you are not very particular."

She uttered a hard, dry laugh, that boded no good to her enemies, and then she search-"What do you mean?" asked the detective ed among her clothes for something that quickly, alarmed as much at the way in she could use in her present predicament. "It's interesting," replied Kate, in the which the girl spoke, as at the words she | She soon found it, and then she laughed was a long, keen knife, of the jack-knife

It was a formidable weapon in the hand of an unscrupulous or desperate person, and shrick, and began to splash around in the nonplused as it was possible for him to work at the door with the knife, cutting a hole through the wood near the place where she had noticed the bolt at the moment she was very soon a pile of chips on both sides of the door, and a hole large enough for her Again she laughed as she shot back the bolt and stepped into the outer room.

"They can't keep Mother Rachel in when cure y: "Oh, is that all? Why, there restoring her to consciousness, and that fail- she wants to get out," she muttered. "Now, are hundreds of thousands of rats in these ing, he tried a remedy that is sometimes used 'Mr. Snipe, I'm thinking you will wish you.

Rachel."

She glanced at Barney Doran contemptuously, as she made her way to the hole by. which she would gain the wharf above her, and then, moved by a spirit of vengeance that she could not restrain, she came back to him and poised the knife over the sleeping man,

She was aiming straight at his heart!

The look of ferocity in the face of the old Oi take yez out again." Fury seemed to make it impossible that the unconscious man could escape the fatal blow that was about to descend, and it seemed as | eye with the other. if his life was worth not a minute's purchase.

"You meddling jackanapes!" she hissed, as she clutched the dagger and would have buried it in his body, but, controlled by one of those mysterious influences that sometimes interfere for the preservation or ruin of human beings, Barney Doran rolled at and the knife was buried in the mattress, mouth. the force of the blow actually causing the old woman to fall forward and tumble heavily upon Barney, her sharp, skinny elbow digging into his face.

"Phwat's that!" he yelled, as he struggled to a sitting posture, about half awake. and rubbing his eyes with the back of his hand.

The old woman was so completely nonplused by the escape of the victim and her | so ye can't." own ignominious tumble, that she could not answer. She lay on the mattress, sprawling | about like a very ugly old spider that had somehow partly assumed the shape of a woman, with her knife digging into the straw stuffing of the bed in impotent rage.

"Well, be the corpse of Dinny Rattigan's pig, if you ain't a soight, Oi niver saw the here. back of my own hand!" he muttered, looking at the old woman, with edifying disgust. "Git up out of thot, yez ould shpalpeen, or it's meself will be breaking ivery bone in yer ould careass, so Oi will."

The old woman struggled upon her knees, and glared at him with her green eyes with an expression of such devilish ferocity that Barney involuntarily stepped back.

"You cur!" she hissed.

disrespectful manner, and he realized, more- make it a little more pleasant for her before useful some time. But where vas Snipe?" over, that the old woman should be in the he went, just to get even with her for the cupboard, where she had been placed for attempt upon his life and for the two vicious "Never mind. He vill be back here some safety by Guttersnipe. So he caught her by punches she had given him. There were time, Then ve catch him. Come. Let us her two arms, all squirming as she was, and, plenty of nails around the interior of the as she did not receive this treatment very cabin, used apparently for hanging clothing, kindly, but tried in vain to strike him with hats and various articles of culinary use, other way than over the edge of the dock, her knife, he banged her down on the mat- upon. Taking the jack-knife belonging to and she showed her son where it was. She tress with such force that the knife flew out | Mother Rachel, from his pocket, he knocked | climbed up with considerably agility, de of her hand.

her knife, but Barney was too quick for her. | the door of the cupboard, with the same | way with all haste to Baxter street. "Indade, thin, ye don't have that bit of a implement.

knoife if Oi kin help it, and Oi think Oi kin," observed Barney, with a smile.

"You'd cut me, would you?" she world. croaked.

always perloite ter the ladies, do ye moind? of the cool river breeze. Wull yez be pl'azed to go inter yer boodoor, whoile Oi holds open the dure fer yez?"

He spoke in a tone of mocking politeness that was maddening to Mother Rachel, and it is certain that if she could have got possession of the knife for a moment, she would have made it very lively for the bantering Irishman. But he had the best of the situation, and he knew it. So he only laughed at | her, as he pointed to the cupboard.

She stood her ground resolutely, and Barney saw that if he was to get her into the cupboard, he must carry her there. Since he had been left in charge of her, he made up his mind that he would carry her, if necessary, and he approached her with an expression on his face that was different from that it had worn a moment before, when he was making fun of her.

"Git in there," he said, sternly.

"I won't!"

"Oi think ye wull."

"Put me in, then."-". Howall."

have been supposed from her appearance, and it vas!" she jumped aside and dealt Barney a blow in the eye with her scrawny fist that made him see stars.

"Ow, ye ould skithereen!" he exclaimed, as he caught her around the waist and threw her, all in a heap, into the cupboard. "Shtay there, wid yerself, wull yez, until

He closed the door with a bang and bolted it with one hand, while he wiped his injured

The old woman was ominously quiet. Barney expected to see her hand come through the hole to reach the bolt but it did not come, and after a few moments he cauhe might have expected, Rachel was waiting for him, and no sooner was the door opened

Indeed, there seemed to be considerable reason in Barney's complaint, for he had been dropped rather unceremoniously in for that boy again, send one of your men." this secret crib, and he did not know where Snipe and the banker had gone, except from the hint the boy had let drop, to the effect that he was going to bring Walter Vantine | again," was the sulky answer.

was out of the question.

wull," he muttered.

hour, and he walked to vard the gate with- had in my life!" out meeting a soul till he got just ortside, where he ran plump into the arms of Morris ed man and woman were Cool Bob, the de-Cohen.

"Good-morning, my tear! There vas you going, this morning?" asked the Jew, with a smile that he meant to be propitiatory.

Barney's answer was to take the Jew by the shoulder, and swing him violently aside, so that he banged up against the gatepost with body for the instant. When he recovered himself Barney was gone!

The Jew looked in the direction in which Barney had disappeared and shook his fist.

"It vas all right, my tear! But I know you now, and I was going to attend to your | dazed state that he could not do anything. case before long. I can vait a little vile! I | He clung tightly to Kate, however, perthought the old voman vould haf brought done, for the water actually filled up the

had never tried to play your tricks on Mother | Barney advanced upon the old woman, him back. But, instead of that, she vas lost, but she was much more active than might as vell as the boy! Ah, what a vicked world

> Thus moralizing, Morris went inside and walked out on the dock, looking all about him to try and discover whether there was any hiding-place in the neighborhood.

> "Ah! Vhat vas that? I thought I heard some one call! I did! Yes, I did hear some one!"

A cry, in a woman's voice, could be faintly distinguished immediately beneath his feet, and he was down on his knees, looking through the cracks in the flooring. He was used to queer discoveries, and moreover he was sure that Snipe had some secret retreat in the neighborhood. So it did not surprise him when he saw the carefully built cabin tiously opened the door and peered in. As with which the reader has already become acquainted.

Although a casual observer might not have wide enough than her hand shot out, and | noticed that the crib was anything more than that moment completely over in his sleep, dealt him another thump—this time in his an accidental boarding up of a part of the space between the piles descending into the "Bedad! Ye'll shtay there now, an' Oi'll muddy water, Morris knew at once that he not be disturbin' yez, so Oi won't Oi had found the place of which he was in t'ought Oi'd shtay here an' hove a bit of a search, and he sought the means of reachshlape befoor goin' up-town, but begorra, Oi ling it. He soon found it, and in less than think Oi'll go to me boordin'-house and lie | two minutes he was knocking out the nail down till the afternoon. Thin Oi'll go to that held the bolt of the cupboard in which the bank, an' see whether Mr. Vantine wants | his mother was confined, and soon Mother me, or whether he has foired me out of his | Rachel, considerably ruffled, and as mad as a sarvice. Ye can't trust any one these days, | hornet, stalked out and looked at him reproachfully.

"Mother!"

"Yes, and when you want a yone to look

"Are you hurt, mother?"

"No, I vas not much hurt, but that Irishman vill be when I get my hands on him

In a few words, Mother Rachel told of her Barney had a sort of presentiment that adventures, punctuating her recital with there was trouble at the Baxter street dive, threats against Barney, Guttersnipe, and where Snipe was supposed to have gone, and, every one except her son of whom she seemputting this and that together, he could not ed to stand in considerable awe. Parsee that it would be profitable for him to ticularly did she inveigh against Kate Fairremain where he was, now that he saw sleep | leigh, and it is safe to assume that if the girl had been within reach of the hag's ten "Oi'll just shlip out of this place, and let fingers at that moment, the claws on those the ould woman have it all to herself, so Oi | fingers would have sought poor Kate's face.

"Let's get out of this place, mother. Ve Barney did not like to be addressed in that | But he could not resist the temptation to know where it was, now, and it may be

"I haven't seen him."

The old woman had come down by anout one of the nails with the handle and clining the proffered assistance of her son, She tried to release herself, so as to reach | then fastened the nail in against the bolt in | and the two precious beauties made their

They had hardly disappeared from the "There, me lovely shwatcheart. If you crib, before a man, soaked with water, with shpring that bolt now from the inside, faith, a woman's form held tightly over his He threw the old woman into a corner, ye're welcome to git out, so yez are," he ob | shoulder, crawled up from the river and dropand picked up the knife before she could served, with a smile, as he opened the door | ped exhausted on the little platform just out recover herself. Then he approached her, of the hut, after blowing out the light in side the crib under the dock. Had he been a with the knife in his hand, ready for busi- | the lamp, and crawled to the dock above. | minute sooner he would have encountered ness, for he felt that she was not to be It was broad daylight now, and he had no the Jew and his mother, and this narrative trusted, even if she was only an old woman. difficulty in finding his way to the upper might have taken an altogether different coaked.

"Be me sowl, the air tastes good," was "Phew!" said the man, as he carefully his first remark as he took a long inspiration laid his companion on the little ledge as I tried to wipe some of the water out of his The dock was quiet enough at that early eyes, "this is as tough a job as I have ever

> Is it necessary to say that the half-drowntective, and Kate Fairleigh?

CHAPTER XIII.

IN THE WATER DEMON'S CLUTCH.

THE reader will be curious to know how a force that took all the breath out of his the detective and his companion managed to reach the comparative safety of Gutter snipe's secret retreat under the dock.

When the great rush of water in the main sewer almost took all the breath out of the detective he was for a moment in such a can vait! Now, I must find the old voman, haps more through instinct than anything She was my mother, and I can't let any one else, and was thrown about by the rushing hurt her, even if she vas an old fool. Snipe | water, without making any attempt to has been vatched coming to this yard, and I out. True, there was nothing he could have whole space, and although he floated to the top, his head touched the bricks in the roof | tive, admiringly. "It is what I like to hear, of the arch, and he was thus kept under the either from a man or woman."

flood in spite of himself.

sudden "flush," for it subsided almost, dark, awful place having a wonderful effect although not quite, as quickly as it had arisen, and as the detective got his mouth jumped on her shoulder and off again just and nostrils above the flood, his ideas re- as they reached the bend in the sewer she turned, and he was able to account for the did not even shudder. catastrophe.

a ferry-boat, must have got near the mouth | guished, and the cool air blew in with conof the sewer. That is what it was, no doubt. siderable force, as was natural, there being Deuced unpleasant, but this whole thing is a strong draught through the archway, ARTEST AND ADDRESS OF THE PERSON ASSESSMENT AND ADDRESS OF TAXABLE A sophic comment.

There was some satisfaction in the matter, for it proved to the detective that they were not very far from the mouth of the sewer, and that they would soon know their fate. Either they were to get out all right, or to be drowned like kittens in a bag.

One thing took place now that gave the detective encouragement. Kate was regaining consciousness. He felt her move on his shoulder, and as he gently dropped her to morning sun, so that it looked like a sea of her feet in the water she took her arms from blood. his neck, and stood alone, with her hand resting lightly on his shoulder.

"That's a relief. How do you feel now, Kate?" he asked.

"I—I—have been dreaming," she said, feebly. "Oh, yes I remember all, now."

"Do you? Then, you must remember that we have been having a rather rough he was some distance back in the sewer, and time, and a damp time at that," responded | that his companion had disappeared. the detective. "Can you walk a little, now?"

"Yes, I am all right."

"I don't think you are," was the detective's unspoken comment. "But if you can walk for a while it will give me a chance to get up my strength for another spell of carrying you."

He gave her his arm, and they plodded on for a few yards further when another rush | not see anything of the girl, but another cry of water took them off their feet, and sent | guided him toward a cluster of piles that subsided.

enough for them to touch the bottom again always attracted to the shore of a strong Corden took the girl by the arm and dragged | tidal river. her forward as fast as they could go. His object was to make as much headway as possible before they were again taken off [hurry!" their feet, for he felt sure that they had not alized that the nearer they approached to in the water with a speed that was wonderthere was of their meeting these resistless and that his clothes were dragging him masses of water, because any craft passing near the mouth would wash up some water, that would go a little way into the sewer, although not so far as the waves from a ferryboat or other steam-using vessel.

They must expect to be washed off their feet each time, and the only chance for them was to get so far ahead that they would make progress in spite of these setbacks.

The detective felt sure that, if it were not for these waves, he would have been out of the sewer before this.

Kate was now very weak, and whenever one of these waves broke into the vaulted space through which she and her companion were laboriously making their way, she seemed to lose some of the power she had had, and it took the detective several minutes to get her into condition to go on fast, which left a short space of time between the waves for them to proceed on their journey.

But he bravely stuck to his task, and as he had the assurance of Kate herself that she was improving all the time, it was reasonable enough for him to believe that it would not be long before the crucial moment would arrive, when they would either be saved or irrevocably be lost.

They had just emerged from a particularly large and powerful wave, when the detective uttered a cry of joy. . He could see daylight!

" South Kate. There is a buttor line just renables of these factors. It so come that we have the the field fithers, count to at the beat made among L. V is classes or in 12 to the collection of the Open, even if we agree to but be altered but.

"We shall not be beaten at last," respondcel the cirl, faithfy, but continue out the

"That's the kind of talk," said the detec-

Fortunately, the rush of water was a mere now, the prospect of soon being out of this upon the girl, so that even when a big rat

The lapping of the river outside the en-"One of those confounded steamers, or trance to the sewer could be plainly distin which was no doubt to be thanked for the two refugees not having been stifled by the smell of the sewage.

"Now, Kate, you told me you could swim."

"Well, prepare to swim."

" Very well."

A few more steps, and they were at the spike. very edge of the arched main, with the East River before them, shining in the early

"Pretty, but cold," observed the detective, sententiously. "But we are used to tions. the cold by this time. Now, Kate, come!"

As he spoke he threw himself forward into the river just as a rolling wave from a passing ferry-boat dashed against him. When he recovered himself, he found that

"Kate," he cried, as he rushed forward, and plunged into the river with a strong stroke.

He heard a faint cry somewhere to his right, and he turned in that direction, swimming with all the power he could summon, for the cry was in the voice of Kate Fairleigh, and it told that she was in distress.

He raised himself in the water, but could

"Katel"

"Here I am! Hurry! For pity's sake,

There could be no mistake that the girl experienced the last of the waves. He re- was in sore straits, and Corden shot forward it open. the mouth of the sewer, the more likelihood | ful, considering that he was fully dressed, down.

> Half a dozen swift strokes brought him within view of the girl, who was holding to one of the slippery piles with all her strength—a strength that was fast giving

"Hold on, just a minute, and I'll be with you," shouted the detective, encouragingly, as he noted how weak the girl was.

He redoubled his efforts, and was within a yard of her, when, suddenly, a tug-boat went pufling by, and a series of waves came upon him, and in spite of all his efforts, sent him back, and dashed him violently against one of the piles, some distance from the girl. His head struck the head of a large spike and stunned him for the moment. He ceased swimming and sunk like a stone.

The wave caught Kate, too, and her grasp slipped from the slimy wood, allowing her to drop back in the water. She did not sink, however. She was an expert swim mer, and realizing intuitively that she was too weak to swim, she threw herself on her back, and allowed herself to float idly at the pleasure of the surf.

The detective did not remain below the surface long. Although the blow upon his head caused him exquisite pain, he was not knocked senseless for more than a moment, correct this limit instable burnings to the discountry Through the manufacture outs subsite from the time truth

The circulate state of the selection of directed to the law to the same of the sam to which along the profile, in point he have a around in the hope of seeing her while he in the vicinity.

"There she is," he cried, involuntarily,

"and she is a brave one, too. They can't kill a girl like that!"

He swam toward where Kate was float-They moved forward at a quicker pace ing on her back, and this time he managed to get hold of her. She turned her face toward him, and, feeling that she was safe, swooned again.

> "Never mind. She will be all the easier to handle like that," thought the detective, as he seized her by the top of her dress behind, so that she could rest her head upon his arm, and he swam toward the piles, and clasping one of them, managed to get his foot on a big spike that he felt with his foot under the water.

> It was a difficult task to raise himself and his burden out of the water, but the detective was a wiry fellow, with marvelous power in his hand, and when he saw another great spike sticking out of the wood a foot over his head, he made up his mind that he could crawl out without so very much trouble if he could once reach that

It required several efforts, but he was successful at last, and he was gradually going up the pile, with Kate in his arms, when he heard voices over his head that he recognized, and that made him cease his exer-

The voices were those of Morris Cohen and his mother, and although Bob did not understand how the Jew and Mother Rachel had come to this spot, he knew he had not made any mistake as to the fact, and that it would not be wise for him to show himself to them at this moment, in his exhausted state, and with Kate Fairleigh actually ununconscious.

"What in thunderation are they doing here?" he muttered. "I wish they would get out."

Perhaps he might have been obliged to show himself, for he could not have remained in his present position very long, but fortunately, they did not keep him more than a few moments. They were just about to go away, as related in the last chapter, them floating about helplessly until the wave | upheld a dock, and that arose from the wa- and by the time the detective had made up ter in the midst of a lot of sawdust, splin- his mind that he must meet them at any As soon as the water had gone down ters of wood and other rubbish such as is risk; because he could not hold on any longer, they had crawled to the dock above them and the coast was clear.

To reach the ledge in front of the crib was the work of a moment now, and the detective was bestowing some hearty kicks upon the door of Guttersnipe's retreat that soon forced

He carried the girl inside, lighted the lamp, and then closed the door. He made free with everything in the place, and hunted around for something to revive the girl. He found coffee, bread and butter, ham and other comestibles, and noticed that there was an oil-stove. He lighted the stove and put some coffee on to boil, there being a pail of pretty clean water in one corner that he presumed was intended for drinking purposes, and that he concluded would be good enough if it were boiled with coffee.

"Ah! This is cool. We ought to get some dry clothing, but it is not likely that there is anything of that kind here. And yet, I don't know. What's this?"

On the mattress already referred to there were some quilts and blankets that looked as if they might have been stolen from a drygoods house, as they were new and clean. He turned them over and then he caught sight of something sticking out from beneath the mattress that made him utter a cry of satisfaction.

It was a woman's dress of dark brown cloth, and searching a little further, he found skirts and other articles of women's attire, including several pairs of slippers. "I don't suppose these things were acquired honestly, but they are very handy at this time."

He looked at Kate, who was sitting back in a chair in a corner, watching him considerably interested, as she gradually came back to herself, for she had come out of her swoon as soon as the detective had taken her from the water, and, with the strong constitution she possessed, was not so very much the worse for her terrible experience of the night.

"Kate, you will have to rig yourself out in these things, and then we will see what is next to be done."

"Very well, Bob," answered the girl, composedly, for she had perfect confidence what he would have expected of a man as pride of proprietorship, and feeling that in the detective, and would have done any- | smart and brave as Cool Bob Corden. thing he suggested as the best under the cir- 'But if Cool Bob brought yer here, where cumstances.

in the neighborhood, and where they know girl. "He has gone to change his clothes. changing your things, and will be back in went to a place be knows in the neighborhalf an hour. Look after that coffee, and | hood, and I stayed here and—" keep the door locked while I am gone. I "Put on dem togs w'ot I swiped from won't be more than half an hour, and when Mother Rachel," interrupted the boy, with a I come back we will have a little breakfast, broad grin. "I'm going ter give dem things and see what is next to be done."

"I think some sleep would be a good

a smile.

merror.

hot coffee as soon as it is ready."

Kate did as he had told her, with the result that she felt strong enough for anything. The dress and other things fitted her as well as if they had had been made for her, and the cup of hot coffee that she took put new life in her.

She was smiling at herself in a broken piece of mirror nailed up against the side of the shanty, as she arranged the long, dark tresses of her hair, when she started, with a lat Kate, who was busying herself preparing half-suppressed shrick, as she saw another some coffee and other materials for breakface looking at her over her shoulder in the fast.

CHAPTER XIV.

CLEARING THE DECKS FOR ACTION.

For a moment Kate felt a return of her faintness. Then she saw whose face it was, and she felt that it was not to be feared, especially when a well-known voice cried, cheerfully:

"Hully chee! If this ain't one of dem funny tings w'ot only happen once in a while, may I be 'lectrocuted!"

around.

"Snipe it is," and to show that he was | dently the two understood each other. glad to see her, the lad caught Kate's hand "This is your crib, ch, Snipe?" asked the in his own not over-clean paw, and gave it detective, still smiling. "I didn't know you | Twister Detective opened his eyes, and a squeeze that bespoke the heartiness of his were so well fixed." welcome.

"What brought you here?" asked Kate, as she tried not to show that the boy had hurt her fingers. "What place is this?"

"Oh, Kate, how ignorant some people is, and free schools all over de country! Why, dis is my crib, where I has my friends come to see me when I don't want de oder mugs to know where I is. Dis is Snipe's Castle, don't yer see? I might ask w'ot brought you here, if I wasn't too perlite ter ask imperdent questions of a girl."

"I'll tell you how it was, Snipe," answered the girl, with a smile. "Morris and the gang dropped me down the trap under dive." the kitchen, and I have managed to get out of it, by way of the river, and here I am."

"W'ot yer givin' us? Do yer think I'm were here just now." a gilly? Tell me yer got out of dat lower cellar and out ter der river! Go an' teil dat ter some of der baby mugs, but don't try ter give it ter me. It won't work."

dropped the detective-"

ter say they had him down der hole?"

" Yes." "Den yer needn't say no more. If he be sure," observed Kate. wos down dere wid yer, of course yer got "You are right," agreed the detective. out. I tell yer dat feller's a bird. See? "It will therefore be a wise thing for us to Dev could not keep him in any hole, if dey leave as soon as possible," was ter put a hundred tons of gun-metal i "You ain't afraid of dem, are you, Bob?" over der door. No he can't be held down by asked Snipe, somewhat surprised. none of dem Baxter street mugs, an' don't, "No, but I do not think it would be wise ing to carry out this job at the bank. I yer forgit it. See?"

meant he would like to see any one disprove have escaped from the cellar vet. Let us are trying to give the impression that they the position he was taking on the detective's have breakfast, and then we will leave." prowess, and when Kate told him in detail "All side. I'm in it how she and Corden had made their way Thatian . . . danted the tallet to the a very the analysis profile the same there is the self into their clutches?" time, and accepted the winds only a the find and the other in house, and the plant of the finales. I the other is he?" asked Snipe.

"I will go around to a saloon I know of "He will be here directly," answered the me, and get my things dried, while you are; We were both soaked with water. So he back ter der people w'ot dey wos took from -dat is, when you get t'rough wid dem. thing for both of us," suggested Kate, with Dey was stole from a boardin'-house on Fourteenth street by Ikey Bill, an' Mother "You are right, but you can't sleep in Rachel gave him five dollars for der lot, Mother Rachel's house, and I must find some | trunk an' all. I know de gal w'ot dey beother place for you. Now, hurry and get longs ter, an' I don't propose to let de into those dry clothes, and drink a cup of gang rob her if I knows myself. So as mugs to get away wid her togs. I'll take soon as der old woman got der trunk stowed Kate up dere an' I know she can stay as No sooner had the detective gone than away in der back of der store, I sneaked up long as she wants" dere and took der tings away, bit by bit, waitin' fer a chance ter return 'em widout | gettin' myself into no trouble. I couldn't take der trunk, too, but if der gal gets back her clothes, I guess she will let der trunk

Guttersnipe was obliged to pause for breath after delivering himself of this long speech, during which he looked admiringly

"Don't you want some breakfast, Snipe?" "Well, I should say so. I've been up all night, and I'm hungry and thirsty and tired. When I've had someting to eat an' drink, I'll just lie down bere an' take a snooze."

"I wouldn't if I were 'you," put in an- a very good arrangement. other voice, quietly, and Snipe, turning quickly, saw Cool Bob, the Twister, standing behind him, smiling.

"Hallo, Bob." cried the boy. "Ain't Thirty-seventh street." seen you fer a long time. Where ha' you been keepin yerself?"

"Well, I had to get a place of my own, you know, Bob. Since the time you took trying to keep straight. Although it is pretty hard to do it when a feller has to stay wid dat gang down on Baxter street."

"Never mind, Snipe, you are through with them now."

"Yes, I know dat. I wouldn't go in I an' I has a water entrance, and a land front, dere again for a fortune. Dey would never let me out alive."

"I know that, too, Snipe."

"Seems to me you know everyt'ing, Bob," you it is gettin' pretty hot down in der

"Yes, and it is likely to get pretty hot a bath?" down here, too Mother Rachel and Morris

" Morris?"

1. 11

Snipe whistled.

"I knew de old woman was down here, "But I did, I tell you, Snipe. Before because I fastened her in der cupboard over they had put me down there, they had dere. An' just now I saw der two of dem walkin' long der streets, an' I t'ought p'raps "The Twister Detective?" interrupted he had found her. But I kept out of dere the boy, excitedly. "Wot, do yer mean sight. I didn't want ter have no guff wid dem people."

"They will be back before long, you may the a manufacture in the world, and past the looking around him me will be in the world hand anything almost my he was indeed a host.

"Now, the next thing is for us to get a few hours' sleep," said the detective, as they concluded their breakfast, and he noticed that the girl was hardly able to keep her eyes open. "Where can we send Kate, I wonder? I do not think it would be wise for her to go to a hotel, because it would excite remark. I suppose I had better take her to my sister's in Harlem."

"I've got a better scheme dan dat," put in Snipe. "Dere is a boarding-house on Fourteenth street, near Third avenue, where dat girl lives w'ot owns dem clothes. She is a dressmaker, an' a mighty good girl, too. She has given me a meal many a time when I've been hungry, so she has, an' dat's one reason why I wouldn't allow dem Baxter street

"Very well. Take her there, and then I want you to come with me," said Bob. "We will go on a Broadway car, all together."

This arrangement suited all, and in less than ten minutes the three were riding up Broadway, in the happy consciousness that no one would suppose from their appearance that they had passed through a night which was anything but peaceful.

Guttersnipe was as good as his word in bestowing Kate Fairleigh comfortably with the dressmaker at the Fourteenth street boarding-house, and when he rejoined the detective at the corner of Third avenue, after introducing Kate to the dressmaker, he said that the two girls had taken to each other from the first, and he thought he had made

"Now, let us go and get some sleep ourselves, Snipe," said the detective. "You will have to come to my room, on West

A very comfortable suite of rooms was the home of the detective, and it was not more The boy's manner was familiar, and he did than ten minutes after he and Snipe had ennot seem the least bit in awe of the detective | tered the apartments when they were both "Snipe!" cried the girl, as she turned whose name was a terror to so many of the sound asleep in adjoining rooms, recruiting crooked fraternity of New York. But evi- their strength for whatever might come in their way when they awoke.

It was late in the afternoon when the stretched himself with a feeling of comfort, for he possessed a vigorous constitution, and a few hours of sleep were always enough to me in for stealing a pocketbook, I've been I recuperate him after any exertions, even when they were so severe as those of the i preceding night. He went to the bedreom adjoining, and was soon in the delights of a plunge, in cold water, followed by a brisk rubbing that made him feel like a new man.

As he emerged from the bathroom he saw Snipe sitting up in bed in a bewildered con-

"Hully chee! This is der swellest place I ever slept in," said the young man, grinning returned the boy, admiringly. "But I tell at the detective. "I believe I'll stay an" board wid you always, Bob."

"All right, Snipe. Are you going to take

The boy shook his head.

"Not to-day, Captain Robert. I took one last month, an' I don't want ter put en too many airs all ter once."

"I think you had better," suggested the detective. "It will make you feel better."

"Is the water warm?"

"Yes. You can use all the hot water you want. But I used cold, and I feel like a twoyear-old," answered Corden.

"Well, I'll try it hot. I don't want ter try no tricks wid my constituotion," answer ed the boy, with a grin, as he sprung out of bed, and going to the bathroom, began to splash around like a young porpoise, while the detective completed his own toilet.

"Now, Snipe," said the Twister Detective, "I want you to go down to Baxter street, to try to find out when they are gofor them to find out I am here. I don't know know they are going to do it pretty soon, The boy shook his head in a manner that whether they even know that Kate and I but I want to know exactly when. They have dropped it altogether, but I know better. Do you think you can find any of the crowd down there who will let you know months the really item plant at the Kare, who but a real through getting your-

River, In only mainly his health with the boy, or a second with "Yes," answered the boy, or a second second my crib, because de old woman and Morris | the darkness. will both be afraid to let any one know dat dey were down dere. Dey never tell de rest of de gang anything dat dey do. Dey's awful suspicious mugs, dey is."

"Very well. Then you get down there, and be back here by nine o'clock. Here's an extra key to the room, and you can ring the bell at the front door, I'll tell the people down-stairs that they are to let you in when you come."

" All right. Dat all?"

"That's all."

"Good-by, den, till nine o'clock."

As the boy spoke he slipped out of the room, and a moment later the detective heard the front door bang.

got him away from those rascals on Baxter | jump down and look for the prisoners. street, I believe I shall be able to make a likey Bill hesitated for a moment, and man of him," soliloquized the captain, as he | Morris gave him a push, so that he lost his | got nabbed?" walked leisurely toward the banker's house, I balance, and was obliged to jump into the on Fifth avenue, and where, as we know, hole. he appeared very unexpectedly to Walter Vantine in the back parlor, after the young man's interview with the Serpent.

CHAPTER XV.

THE RATS AND THE FOX.

When Morris Cohen and Rachel returned to the Baxter street store they were in anything but a pleasant frame of mind. They both feared that the boy, Guttersnipe, would get into mischief, and that the result might lea thorough overhauling of their place, with the revelation of secrets that would not be for their benefit. Shrewd as Morris was, he did not think it possible that the police knew anything about the underground kitchen, and still less about the sub-cellar, into which he had sent the detective and Kate, and that he determined should be the grave of the man, if not of the woman.

"Vell, my tear son, ve are in a bad fix, eh?" observed the hag, when she and her son had reached the parlor behind the store, after carefully securing the front door.

"Shut up!" was Morris's undutiful re- clutches.

sponse. "Let me think!"

That boy has got away, and he vill bring all the police about our ears before ve can get things ready to make a good showing. You mark my vords."

"I'll mark your face with my fist, if you don't stop your croaking," howled Morris, savagely. "Vhere's the gang?"

"Down-stairs, my tear, fast asleep."

"Well, get out of the vay!"

trap in the way already described, and let ous to himself as to any one if Cool Bob in his march to look contemptuously at his himself down to the lower apartment. He were to get out into the world with the two companions. went through the usual form before Ikey | secret of this retreat in his possession, to use | "W'ot the bloomin' dickens are we to kitchen.

a corner, but there was no one else in the | the police. room except Ikey Bill, who had evidently been awakened from a sound slumber him- peeped into the pipe, but he was soon con- A thought suddenly struck Morris, and he had been lying down in his clothes, turning | their lives in their flight. in "all standing," as the sailors say.

men in Morris Cohen's gang that they were know." all afraid of him, although physically he was | Ikey nodded. He had nothing to offer, | the smallest and weakest among them. But | and he knew by experience that it was they knew that he possessed the secrets of safer to say nothing than to hazard a retheir lives, and that he could send any or all | mark that did not coincide with the views of of them to Sing Sing at any time, if he | Morris Cohen. chose, and that he was likely to do it if there were any insubordination. It was even | valk through a place like that, and not be feared by some of them that he could prove drowned. Vell, let them go. I don't care, charges of murder against them, and that he | so they don't bother me," went on the Jew therefore actually held their lives in his with a nervous chuckle. hands. As for himself, although he was a greater scoundrel than any of them, he was sharp enough to make others do the actual | think the detective and Kate could escape work, so that none of them could bring up anything a minst him, if it came to a "show down," as Guttersnipe had been heard to remark on one occasion

Ikey Bill opened the trap, after pushing aside the stove and the square of zine, and then giving it a quick shove with his heel, sent the trap to the bottom of the hole.

"Hello, down there!" cried the Jew, stand-malignantly as he looked at Ikey Bill and was in the kitchen. said:

damp, but they have to get used to it. | chuckle. "But I guess I vant to use him, Bring me that light." He pointed to an in- so I will bring him up." candescent lamp, hanging by a cord from the ceiling, there being a good deal of slack | Ikey Bill to come up, and then, as they rethat was coiled up and fastened with a loose placed the zine and stove, Billy the Bowler knot.

Ikey took hold of the lamp and uncoiled the cord, and the Jew let the powerful electric light down into the sub-cellar. One swift glance around it was enough for him, and then, as he saw it was empty, and that there was a great hole in the sewer-pipe, he fairly "He's a lively boy, that, and now I've | danced with rage, as he ordered lkey Bill to | his senses, and he saw that there was some-

"Do as I tell you, vill you?" growled the Jew.

Ikey would like to have protested against this unceremonious treatment, but he knew it would not be safe to do so, and he groped obediently about the sub-cellar, examining every corner, and even crawling a little way along the pipe, in the water, through the hole by which, as we know, the detective and Kate Fairleigh had made their escape. He soon came out, and looking up to the Jew, whose anxious face was peering over the edge of the hole, shook his head.

"V'at?" howled Morris. "Gone?"

"Gone," replied Ikey Bill.

into any place where he would be at the to the Jew and looked into his eyes, as if mercy of the gang, because he knew that to make sure that he was telling the truth. the desire to get even with him always existed among them, and that they only wanted | 'ave they gone?" a good opportunity to carry their desire in-himself gingerly down into the cellar, keep- | do!"

erous act. On the other hand, he seemed wildered. He pushed aside the table and opened the | detective. He realized that it was as danger. | day?" suddenly demanded the Jew, stopping Billy the Bowler was sleeping soundly in | ticular reasons for keeping out of the way of | do?"

The Jew looked all about the cellar and in the wind."

"Help me with this trap." he commanded last. "They have gone through this sewer there," objected Billy the Bowler to some shortly, and Ikey, obeyed without a word. pipe, but I don't think they vill ever go out proposition on the part of Morris. It was a noticeable peculiarity of all the the other end alive. They can't do it, you

"Vhy, it was silly to think that they could

But although he expressed himself so confidently, he was not satisfied. He did not that way, but they might, and he would rather have seen their dead bodies, if not their living selves, than to have the uncomfortable feeling that they might turn up at some awkward moment, and make trouble for him when he least expected it.

"Vell, let us get out of this, Ikey. It! vas no good our stopping down here to get the grip."

putting Mother Rachel in dat cupboard in ling over the opening and peering down into He stepped upon the trap that had been resting on the bottom of the cellar, and touch-There was no answer, and the Jew grinned ing the rope, it flew up to its place, and he

"V'at a joke it would be to let Ikey stay "Vonder if they are both asleep. Kind of down there for an hour," he thought, with a

He let down the trap again, and allowed stretched himself and woke up.

"What's all this 'ere bloomin' row about?" he demanded, sleepily. "'Allo, Morris, old. pal. 'Ave yer come 'ome?"

Morris sneezed violently, for he had managed to catch a cold in the cellar, and the noise he made brought Billy entirely to thing wrong.

"W'ot's the matter? Any of the coves

"Vorse than that, and it's all your fault," replied the Jew, who was only too ready to place the blame on any one. "If you had been keepin' vatch, as you should, it would never have happened."

"Well, w'ot 'as 'appened? Come, speak up, give it a name," exclaimed Billy, rather snappishly.

"Why, Cool Bob and Kate has got out. Got away! Gone out of the cellar, after vehad all the trouble to put them there. That's v'at has happened. And you and the other fools right over their heads, and didn't know anything about it," spluttered Morris. "That's v'at has happened!"

This information brought Billy the Bowler to his feet in a hurry, and there was genuine Morris Cohen made it a rule never to go | consternation in his face as he rushed up

"But 'ow did they get away, and where

"Why, you fool! If I knew where they to effect. But in this case he could not be vas, do you suppose I vould be standing satisfied unless he went down into the here, talking to you? How do I know cellar and saw for himself that Cool Bob and | where they are? I only know that they was Kate Fairleigh had actually got out of his gone, and that we may have the police down on us at any moment. But mind you," He examined a six-shooter and a knife that | went on Morris, in a wild burst of rage, "if "You should have thought before, my he carried in convenient pockets, where he the police find us down here, I'll hand over tear. Now is the time to act, not to think. | could get at them at a moment's notice, | every one of you I will, so help me. So and then glancing over at Billy the Bowler | you'd better find out where they was, an' to make sure that he was fast asleep he let! bring them back. That's viat you must > ing one eye on Ikey Bill all the while. He walked up and down the kitchen, But Ikey evidently did not think this a lalternatively shaking his fists and pulling at propitious time for settling accounts with his long hair, like one demented, while Ikey Morris, for he did not offer to do any treach- Bill and Billy the Bowler looked on, be-> really anxious to help the Jew to find the "Vell, are you going to stand there all

Bill opened the door and let him into the interest of law and order, and for the do?" asked Billy the Bowler. "You don't discomfiture of the gentlemen who had par- give a cove no chance. W'ot are we to "Do? Go out and try an' find out what is self, for his eyes were half-closed, and he vinced that his prisoners had indeed got away almost smiled at his own smartness. He had the disheveled appearance of a man who | from him, even if they had not preserved | beckoned Billy the Bowler to come, and then whispered in his car.

"I told you v'at it vas, Ikey," he said, at | "S'pose Cool Bob 'appens to be around

The Jew shrugged his shoulders impatiently.

"No fear of that, my tear. All I vant you to do is to go into Vantine's bank with this tventy-tollar gold-piece and ask them to give you paper money for it, because you vant to send it in a letter to your sister in Arizona. See? Then, when you are in the bank, vatch everything, and see whether old Mr. Vantine or young Mr. Vantine is there, and whether Cool Bob or the Serpent are anywhere about."

"Well, you are a bloomin' idiot, Morris. As if the Serpent would be about there.

He's a cove as 'as too much sense."

"You can't alvays tell, my tear. I haven't seen the Serpent since last night, and he's not the sort of man to let a big job slip through his fingers because he has one setback. You do as I tell you, my tear. Keep around the bank all day, if the old man vas there, and then vatch where he goes to when the bank closes, and let me know this evening, my tear."

"Well, where's the bloomin' twenty?"

"Oh, yes, my tear, I'd almost forgotten that," said Morris, as he fumbled in his pockets. "Money is awful scarce, my tear, and I do not think I have tventy tollars. Oh, yes, here is just von piece of money at the bottom of this vest pocket, and it is just tventy tollars. It is all I have, and I didn't know I had that."

Billy the Bowler smiled as the Jew put the money in his hands, and carelessly dropping it in one of his trowsers pockets, he picked up his hat and made for the door.

The Jew lifted up his hands in deprecation | etly. of the carelessness with which Billy took the coin, and said something about it being a sin to vaste a whole tventy dollars just to find out somethings.

But Billy the Bowler did not care for Morris's bewailings. He opened the door, and in a moment or two found himself in the store, which Mother Rachel had already opened for business, and which was now festooned outside with numerous suits of clothes of more or less gaudy patterns, to be sold to any stranger who might happen to come along with a few dollars in his pocket.

Billy the Bowler walked carelessly away, and up the Bowery, apparently being a young man of leisure, with nothing on his conscience, but keeping a sharp eye for any stray policeman that might come in his way, with the prudent intention of not drawing the official's attention to him, for however innocent Mr. Bowles might be, he found it better not to obtrude his personality on the members of the New York police force.

Morris Cohen followed Billy the Bowler to the store, leaving Ikey Bill to finish his sleep in the lower room, if he pleased, or to spend his time in any other way he liked.

Mother Rachel was busy arranging the trowsers and other garments outside, as aforesaid, and Morris was standing in the shadows of the dark little store, when suddenly a yell of triumph burst from his lips, and rushing into the street, he dragged from behind a garbage barrel no less a personage that Guttersnipe.

The boy tried to drag himself away, but the Jew had him in a tight clutch, and as he pulled him across the pavement and into the store, he was trying with all his might to choke the lad into insensibility.

CHAPTER XVI.

A FOUL BLOW.

When Corden appeared so unexpectedly to Walter Vantine in front of the door that was supposed to be secured, the young man was for a moment too much surprised to speak,

The detective smiled, and, walking forward, took the seat just vacated by the Serpent, and gazed at Walter curiously.

"Walter," he began, and the young man started at hearing himself addressed in this familiar strain by a perfect stranger. The detective noticed the start, and his smile widened a little as he went on: "You did not know that I was so well acquainted with necessary for us to know many people who handle of the door so that it had all given the Twister Detective." are unaware of the fact."

"Captain Corden," murmured Walter, nothing," he said, with a smile. banker, hardly knowing what he was saying, "I never remember seeing you before." "Never mind about that. The man who just left you is Jim Daly, otherwise the Serpent?"

Walter nodded.

"Exactly. I know it was the Serpent, and I also know that he is playing the double-cross on you." "What do you mean, Corden?"

"I mean that he has tightened his clutches upon you until you have no chance to escape, unless you obey my directions, and help me to bring home his crimes to him. I could catch him now for other jobs that I have just been able to trace to him, but, that is not all I want. He has defied me on several occasions, and now I am going to catch him in the very act of carrying out what he intends to be the great act of his life, at Vantine's bank.", The Twister Detective spoke with rather he preserved his imperturbable expression of smoking, with his back to the door. countenance, notwithstanding.

"Did you overhear all our conversation?"

"Most of it."

"Then you know—"

"I know that you had forged your father's name to a check for $500, and that it is in the possession of Jim Daly, the Serpent."

" Was in his possession, you mean," interrupted the young man, with a smile, glancing at the ashes of the paper he had destroyed, and which lay in the cigar-ash receiver on the table.

"I said 'is,'" rejoined the detective, qui-

Walter looked at him in dismay, as if ask; ing for an explanation, and the detective gave it to him still with that quiet smile that was almost maddening to Walter Vantine:

"The Serpent is a slippery one, Walter. You saw and destroyed a cheek for $500 on the Vantine bank, and you saw that it was signed by Alexander Vantine?"

That was not the check you " Exactly, signed."

"Not the check I signed?" repeated Walter, bewildered.

"No. As I said before, the Serpent is slippery, and it was no part of his game to minute. That confession he got you to sign lightened by giving away his accomplices.

"The double-dyed villain!" gasped Walter. "Yes, he is just that," acquiesced the detective, cheerfully. "Evidently you know him. So he showed you a check resembling the one you signed, and allowed you to destroy it, keeping the real check in case he may need to use it against you at some future

"What am I to do?" asked Walter, despairingly, as he lit another eigar, with trembling fingers, and puffed at it nervously.

"Walter," said the detective, kindly, as he placed his hand on the young man's shoulder, the Penitentiary. Whether your father will ever thoroughly forgive you I do not know. But, at least he will be more disposed to do so if you prove that you have sincerely You will keep close watch over the bank for repented of your misdeeds; and are trying honestly to repair the mischief you have voice caused Walter to get up from his den to himself, in his retreat behind the chair and take Corden's hand, giving it a bookcase curtains.

"I will try," declared Walter, earnestly. but I have taken a liking to you, because and I am going to try and lead you aright, 'time, don't you see?" if I can."

hearty squeeze. "Well, this is enough talk. We must yourself, I believe, Mr. Harris?"

fender, and with his two hands bent it slowly had him working on this matter lately, albut steadily until it was doubled, the two though he is not following the line I have ends touching. Then he straightened it taken up. In fact there is little rivalry beagain in the same manner, Walter watching tween Cool Bob and me to see which shall the feat in silent admiration and astonish-

A tap at the door through which the Serpent had gone, and Walter opened it, to find the footman outside, who said that Mr. Vantine wished to see Mr. Walter in the

As the servant disappeared, Walter looked inquiringly at the detective.

"Go, Walter. I will go, too."

The young man did not understand how the detective intended to explain his presence to the banker, but he did as he was told, for he had implicit faith in his new friend.

Walter found his father seated in his easychair, with his feet resting on the fender, facing the door, while opposite sat the Sermore warmth than was usual with him, but | pent, in his guise of Mr. Harris, composedly room, and caught the banker's eye at once, motioning him not to betray any surprise or notice his presence in the room. This was hardly necessary, for Alexander Vantine had never been known to express astonishment in his life, and the fact of the detective coming into the room with his son was enough for him, and he was quite willing to wait for developments.

"Walter, Mr. Harris has assured me that. we can feel perfectly safe about the bank at present."

The detective opened his eyes and smiled slightly, but he did not make any remark. The Scrpent did not know of his presence. and he had quickly resolved, since coming into the room, that he would not reveal himself. He was quick to form and carry out a plan, and he saw that the large bookcase behind him was open, and that there were heavy curtains before it. He slipped behind the curtains, sitting partly in the bookcase. where he could hear everything that passed without being seen.

At least, it was his purpose not to be seen, but, sharp as he was, he had a man te deal with, in the person of Jim Daly, who was as sharp as the detective.

Strangely enough, Corden had failed to let you out of his clutches for an inch or a cobserve a small mirror on the opposite wall, or that the Serpent's face was reflected in it, will be useful to him only in case he gets and that therefore, the detective's face was nabbed, and wants to get his own sentence, visible to the Serpent as he entered the

Jim Daly was surprised when he saw the detective enter the room with Walter, but he did not permit himself to betray it by a word or look, although his thoughts were whirling in his brain, and he was busy thinking out some plan of escape.

That Cool Bob intended to let him get out of the room except as a prisoner he did not believe for a moment. He realized that his schemes were known to the detective, and he did not doubt that Cool Bob had followed him to this house, and was here to put the nippers on him.

"Smart, but I'll fool him yet!" he thought, as he threw one leg over the other and "you have fallen into bad company, and seemed absorbed in the enjoyment of the you must pay for your weakness. Trust good cigar given him by his host. "Cool to me' and I think I can keep you out of Bob is no match for the Serpent, whatever he may think."

"I am much obliged to you, Mr. Harris, for the attention you have given this case.

the next few weeks, will you?"

"Certainly. I will place a man there to watch. Although I do not think there is. any danger of an attempt being made for a "I am glad to hear you say so. It is no long time, if at all. Still, it is well to be part of a detective's duty to deliver sermons; careful. This man they call the Serpent is a determined sort of a fellow, and he might. I do not believe you are bad-only weak, take it into his head to try the bank at any

"Well, of all the cool impudence, that is Something in the tone of the detective's the best I have ever heard," remarked Cor-

"You are working this case entirely by act," observed the detective, as he went to i "Well, no. There is a very bright man the door by which he had entered, and show- on the force of Secret Service men, Captain you. Well, you see, in my business, it is ed the young man how he had twisted the Corden, who is generally know as Cool Bob, way. "They do not call me the Twister for "I have heard of him," observed the

He took up a thick poker that lay in the "Yes He is a useful man, and I have take possession of the Serpent. I think I have a little the best of it now, but Bob may get ahead after a while. You cannot always'

"Indeed you can't," muttered Corden. "I think, Mr. Serpent, you will find that out before you are much older."

Walter Vantine, who was sitting so that he could look at either the Serpent or Corden, by twisting his eye, glanced from one to the other, and wondered how this farce would end. He had no idea that the Serpent knew of the detective's presence, and was rather amused at the tenor of Daly's remarks, in view of the fact that the detective was sitting immediately behind him, where he could hear every word.

There were a few minutes of silence, as the three—the banker, his son and Jim Daly The detective followed Walter into the puffed their cigars, and appeared to be lost in thought, and then the Serpent arose, | And while he was congratulating himself picked up his hat from a sideboard and upon the smart way in which he had escaped brushed it carefully with his coat-sleeve, the trap laid for him by the detective, there never glancing in the direction of the book- were others on his heels, who would pursue case, although, with the aid of the mirror, him as relentlessly as Cool Bob himself. he did not miss a single move on the part of the detective, who had drawn himself so far | Broadway that is now a thing of the past, back that only the tip of his nose could be! but that for years was famous all over the seen between the curtains.

me to-morrow. I will call upon you-at the bank," said the Serpent, with a slight emphasis on the word "bank" that was not lost on the detective.

The Serpent had a heavy cane that made up his equipment as a solid business man, and he swung it carelessly by the middle as he stood so near to the bookcase that the detective could have touched him, while speaking his farewell words to the banker.

"Very well, Mr. Harris. I shall expect

"I will certainly be there."

detective.

The banker rung the bell, and the footman appeared to show the Serpent to the front game of billiards in the hall, in which a or two, as the Serpent hoped. door. The banker was standing with his had stepped outside the door of the room, in- and evidently much to his surprise. tending to speak to the Serpent at the foot of | Once the countrified-looking old fellow break my bloomin' 'cad." the stairs. This was the opportunity for | bestowed a slight wink upon the Serpent as which Jim Daly had been waiting. Grasp- he walked around the table to make a shot, | ly. ing his cane very firmly, he brought the a wink that the Serpent returned with quiet he turned and walked out of the room, bow- a "sucker," as he would have called him, in thing about the game. ing and smiling pleasantly at the banker as the person of the fashionably-attired young. It was at this moment something happenhe did so.

"Good-night, Mr. Vantine." "Good-night, Mr. Harris"

"Good night, sir. I shall call upon you at the bank."

"Very well, Mr. Harris. Good-night." And Mr. Harris, alias Jim Daly, the Ser-unlimited credit and capital.

upon Mr. Harris had departed, called him ed the roof of the billiard hall. "When smoke, and cough violently." back so peremptorily, that he dared not dis- Morris caught me an' took me inter dat old "Hully chee!" exclaimed Guttersnipe. obey.

CHAPTER XVII.

SHADOWING,

Mr. Harris strolled carelessly away from the banker's house, with his cigar between his lips, and walked down-town till he found himself on Broadway, near Thirtieth street.

Fifth avenue and the cross streets, and an' as fer the ould woman, Oi'd loike to kiss emerged upon Broadway, he had discarded her!" his gray whiskers and glasses, and had Barney uttered such a loud laugh at the ing to Mr. Vantine.

along, swinging his cane, would have re- doings of other people. Or, at least, so it garded him as one of the petted darlings of appeared. Perhaps he was paying more atsociety, with plenty of money, and the tention to his surroundings than he allowed health to enjoy it. If he had any care, it to be seen. did not make itself apparent in his face.

disturbed had he known that his steps were served Snipe, in a whisper. "De old man being dogged, and that every action since he walked lightly down the steps at the banker's house had been noted.

detective. He knew he had given Corden about." a tap on the head that would prevent his "He's all reight, up to his father's house following at once, even if he were not killed beyant," said Barney. "Oi saw him there, outright. The Serpent would not have felt an' Oi just come down here to keep me eye regret if his blow had been fatal, for he had on the Sarpent. () i got a private tip from "taken too many chances of committing mur- Cool Bob to watch, an' not let the Sarpent der in the course of his life, even if he had git out of me soight whin he left the house, not actually "killed his man," to attach any an' bedad Oi'll do it, d'ye moind?" particular importance to the crack he had I bestowed upon the detective.

He smiled slightly as he thought of how completely he had fooled Cool Bob, and how dexterously he had brought his cane down on the detective's forehead without the action being seen.

"The meddling fool!" he muttered. "He above the level of the stairway. will have to learn more about his business before he is a match for Jim Daly! There | then, as his gaze fell upon the Serpent, he isn't one of the crowd that's my match."

He stood for a moment outside a place on country, known as "The White Elephant." "Well, Mr. Vantine, you shall hear from It was a cafe, saloon, bowling alley, and billiard hall, all under one roof, and was a great resert for clubmen, actors, newspaper men, and men about town. Brilliantly lighted and gorgeously decorated, it was his eigar. very attractive, and one could be sure of finding any one who was "doing the town" The old man as been there all day, same as in this place at some time or other during the evening, especially after the theater.

At this time of the evening it was not very alley even as early as this.

countrified-looking old fellow was beating a | back to the bookease, and Walter Vantine fashionably-dressed young man very badly, York.

Although the sharp eyes of the Serpent prised at anything. wandered around the room more than once Barney Doran fell forward from the back appeared to be, a banker or merchant, with | Doran and Guttersnipe, the boy we first met ! front.

in the Baxter street dive.

store on Baxter street, I t'ought I was gone, "What are yer tumblin' all over der mugs sure. But it didn't work, fer I guv him der for, Barney?" trip wid me foot, an' I laid out der old man an' der old woman, both togedder, an' you | Sure me fut shlipped, an' Oi had to tumble couldn't tell which was what while I was somewhere," gittin' out o' dere like a blue streak."

have got away from that ould sheeny. Faith, When he left the quietude and shadows of Oi should like to give him wan just for luck, thrown open his Prince Albert coat, so that bare idea of his touching his lips to the face he planted his fist in the Serpent's chest he looked more like a clubman than the of Mother Rachel that the Serpent started, staid, elderly banker he had been while talk- but as he could not see who had made the noise, he resumed his watching of the game. A stranger, glancing at him as he strolled | without troubling himself further about the

"I found out that the young mug wasn't stairs and down them. And yet he might have been a little bit down dere at Baxter street, anyhow," obcouldn't keep his mout' shut, an' I heerd him send Billy de Bowler ter try an' find out what was goin' on at oder bank, an' ter try The Serpent was not troubled about the ter find out whedder der young feller was him.

"Look out, Barney. Here's Billy der Bowler."

Surely enough, Billy Bowles was just entering the room. The billiard hall was up a flight of stairs from the rest of the establishment, and the boy's quick eye had fallen upon him as soon as the top of his head was Billy the Bowler glanced around him, and strolled over toward him, and stood in front of him, as if accidentally, looking at the game of billiards.

"All right, Billy," said the Serpent, in a low tone. "Everything clear, and business good. Sit down here."

Billy the Bowler understood from this peculiar remark that it was safe to be seen talking to Jim Daly, and he dropped into a scat by his side without hesitation.

"What's new, Billy?" asked the Scrpent. "Morris sent me to see 'ow things looked." "And how do they look?" asked the other, calmly, as he flicked the ashes from

"Everything seemed quiet at the bank. usual, and 'as gone 'ome to get a quiet sleep, I s'pose," grinned the Bowler.

The Serpent did not answer. He made it well patronized, although there were always a rule never to take into his confidence anya few people in the billiard hall or bowling-; body unless it was absolutely necessary for business' sake. In this case, there was no The Serpent strolled into the place and need to tell Billy the Bowler what had "I don't know about that," thought the looked around and then took a glass of soda | taken place at the banker's house, with the water, for he rarely drank any intoxicants, | fact that the detective had received a crack amusing himself afterward by watching a on the head that might lay him up for a day

"Where are you going now, Bowler?" "Back to Baxter street, to see the old bloke. If I don't I suppose he'll want to

"Very likely," observed the Serpent, cool-

Billy the Bowler leaned back in his chair, heavily-loaded head of it down with terrible gravity, having recognized in the apparent with his fingers in the armholes of his vest, force on the forehead of the detective hayseed one of the most expert billiard while he watched the game of billiards with through the curtains of the bookcase! Then players in the city, who had just picked up a critical eye, although really he knew no-

man. It was not safe to judge a stranger by ed which surprised the Bowler, and would his clothes and general appearance in New | have had the same effect upon the Serpent if he had ever allowed himself to be sur-

as he sat on a high chair near the table, he of Billy the Bowler's chair, and lay on did not get a chance to see two people who Billy's lap, with his head on Billy's shoul. pent, walked out of the banker's house as were honoring him with their exclusive at ders, and his heels wildly kicking about comfortably as if he were indeed what he tention, and who were no other than Barney against the Serpent's immaculate shirt

The proceeding was so sudden that Billy Walter was about to follow him down- "Hully chee! I'm glad I met you, Bar- | the Bowler did not know what to make of stairs, but his father, with a face from which | ney," the boy was saying, as the two stood it, while a slight kick on the Serpent's chest all the pleasantness that he had bestowed | behind one of the stout pillars that support made him swallow a mouthful of cigar

"What do you think Oi'm doin' it for?

By this time the Serpent had recovered "Well, be the powers, you are lucky to himself, and seizing Barney by the collar of his coat, he straightened him up and gave him a shake that made Parney's teeth chatter, and at the same time awakened all his ire.

"Who are yer shovin'?" he demanded, as with so much force as to send him reeling against the countrified-looking old man at the billiard table.

The Serpent recovered his equilibrium at once, and doubling his fist, was about to give back Barnev's blow, when a thought seemed to pass through his brain, fer he dropped his hand, and walked swiftly to the

Billy the Bowler was not so prudent as the Serpent, however, for he manifested every desire to have a fight with Barney Doran, as well as with Guttersnipe, and as the boy was nearest, he thought it well to begin with

But here he reckoned without his host, for Snipe was as active as a cat, and at the first sign of belligerence on the part of Billy the Bowler, he flew at him, and gave him a stinging blow in his right eye that made him see stars, and put a little deeper color on it. Then, with a quick step backward, he was out of reach, and Billy the Bowler was in a raging passion.

Of course, this had all caused some disturbance, and one of the attendants of the room was making his way to the spot when Billy the Bowler noticed him, and without any further attempt to be revenged on the boy, he went down the stairs after the Serpent, followed by Barney Doran and the

The Scrpent did not go out of the house. as Billy supposed he would, but slipped around to the bowling alleys, which, as it happened were not in use at that particular time. His object was to get out of sight of Barney and the boy, who he had no doubt now were keeping watch on him by somebody's orders, although he did not know who that somebody might be. But he knew that he had the Vantine bank job in his mind, and that there was more than one person suspicious of him in that connection.

He took a seat in a corner, where he would be shielded from the observation of any desperate tools." casual visitor, and waited for the others to leave the place.

"Curse that Irishman," he muttered. "I don't know what he's after, but his being with that boy is suspicious, now that the kid | reader is already acquainted, and the detechas gone back on the gang. I must get tive nodded approvingly. down and see Morris, and arrange this bank job without any more delay. It is getting altogether too hot for me in New York. want to make my pile, and go abroad for a year or two, for my health."

A sinister smile curled his lip under his black mustache, a smile that turned to a frown, as he saw Barney Doran and Guttersnipe standing at the corner of the room, looking curiously at him.

Neither Barney nor Snipe made any pretense that they were not watching him now. This was Snipe's idea. He said that the Serpent suspected them anyhow, and they might as well give him reason to do so.

The suggestion jumped with Barney's humor, and the two stood, with a stony gaze in their eyes, facing the Serpent, as if they were content to remain there all night.

smoking. Then he arose, and looking straight through Barney, pushed Snipe aside | have no time to go with you now." carelessly, and walked to the White Elephant's front door.

Barney and Snipe were close upon the Ser- | was something so honest in the appearance | pent's heels, and did not leave him even when of the old lady, so far as manner and dress he had gained Broadway, and was watching | can indicate honesty, that he did not feel disthe crowds going into the three or four posed to dismiss her in the off-hand manner theaters in the vicinity.

The Serpent turned around, still with the accosted him on the street in this way. sinister smile alternating with a frown, and, addressing Barney, remarked, in steely said.

tones:

"If you are within reach of my hand in! thirty seconds, I'll kill you. Do you understand?"

when suddenly, a look of surprise came into | close his identity. his face, and, clutching Guttersnipe by the arm, he turned and was out of sight among the hurrying crowd in a moment.

"Sensible fellow!" muttered Daly, as he strolled into the White Elephant again.

"Ile knew I meant what I said."

But, the Serpent was mistaken. It was not on account of what he had said to Barney Doran, but because he and the boy had simultaneously caught sight of the Twister Detective standing on the other side of Broadway, and motioning to them to let the Serpent alone!

CHAPTER XVIII.

MRS. HARRIS.

THE detective saw Jim Daly go into the in the least. White Elephant, and he smiled sweetly as he did so.

"You are safe enough now, Serpent. I shall know where to find you when I want you. I do not think there is any danger of the bank job being attempted to-night, and I'll make my arrangements to meet your next move, at my leisure."

He raised his finger carelessly, as if he front of Alexander Vantine's house. were about to rub his nose, and instantly Guttersnipe was at his side. The boy had been watching for a signal, and was prompt to respond. It was nearly nine o'clock, and than the old lady's manner, and it was this the detective knew he would have found the that added to the surprise of the lad when boy at his rooms at that time had he not met him now. As it was, there was no occasion his neck and held him in so tight a clasp for him go there.

Snipe was about to explain that Walter Vantine had got away from the Baxter street place, but the detective stopped him by in- tle, but he could not cast it off, altogether, forming him that he knew all about it, and and he soon ceased his exertions, while his goes." it was unnecessary for him to explain.

"Well, if dis yer' mug ain't a wonder," gasped the boy, under his breath.

"Where's Barney?" asked the detective. "Here Oi am, sorr. An' Oi'm ready for pull a feller dis yer' way fer?" tary thing."

to night. Are you heeled?"

"Is it weapons, you m'ane?"

"Indade, thin, Oi ain't got anything but what Oi had whin Oi come into the wurrld the two fists on me. But Oi can use thim, when Oi have to," responded Barney.

"Fists are all right for ordinary occasions, Barney. But when you are dealing with desperate men you must be prepared to use "An' be gob! That remoinds me. Oi hove the bit of a knife Oi tuk from the ould woman. Here it is."

Barney showed the knife with which the

"Don't you use that, unless you are so fixed that you cannot help it," he said, quietly.

Barney was about to reply, when an old hold on to you. That's v'at I vill do." to catch the words:

direct me to the house of Mr. Vantine, the | then come with me." banker? He lives somewhere about here, I "How can I?" said Morris. "Who can I believe. I had his address in my pocket- send?" book, but I have lost it, with all my money."

lady's face, but it was impossible to distin- of the earth. guish her features through the thick vail, For a few minutes the Serpent sat, calmly | and he could not tell what she looked like.

"I know where Mr. Vantine lives, but I

"If you will only direct me, I will try and find it myself," answered the old lady.

Billy the Bowler had disappeared, but | Corden was naturally suspicious, but there | that he would have used to most people who

"Perhaps I can find you a guide," he

"Thank you," answered the old lady, with an old-fashioned courtesy.

"Oscar," said the detective to the boy. "Sir," responded the Snipe, [who was ] Barney was about to make a hot reply, | quick to understand that he was not to dis-

> "Show this lady Mr. Vantine's residence, on Fifth avenue, and then come back.

shall be in the White Elephant."

The gamin could not help expressing a little surprise in his countenance, knowing that the Serpent had gone into the place, and that a meeting between him and the detective could scarcely fail to be exciting, but he had learned that it was necessary to obey orders when they were given by the detective, without saying anything, and he motioned to the old lady, and set off up-town, in the direction of Mr. Vantine's house.

They turned into Fifth avenue, and he noticed that the old lady was a pretty good walker, for he had unconsciously quickened his pace, without appearing to distress her breath. Can't you walk a little slower?" asked his companion, mildly.

"I begin to think I must have struck a female pedestrian," was his mental observation, as he walked still faster.

nothing more was said until they stood in

"This is the place," said the street pilot.

"Thank you!"

Nothing could be sweeter or more gentle | suddenly the old lady threw her arms around that he could not get his breath.

Snipe exerted all his strength, and managed to loosen the hug of the old lady a litassailant, finding that the boy was not resisting, allowed his to breathe a little freer.

"Who are you?" asked the gamin, as soon

"Because I'm so glad to see you, my tear,"

"Good! I may want you to do some work | said a well-known voice that made him shiver, bold as he was generally.

"Morris!" he gasped.

"Yes, my tear, Morris!" said the old lady, as she pulled off her black vail and revealed the sinister countenance of the Hebrew. which did not look any handsomer in a black bonnet, and framed by white hair, made up into ringlets.

"What do you want?"

"I vant you, my tear. Don't you think you ought to vas ashamed of yourself to run. avay, and make me an' Mrs. Cohen nearly crazy over you, ch?"

As the Jew thus spoke he gave the boy a pinch on the arm that made him cry out involuntarily.

"Let go me arm, will yer?"

"No, my tear, I vill not let go your arm. I have run all about New York, looking for you, to-night, and I have got you. I vill lady, neatly dressed in black, with a black | "Quit your fooling!" interposed another vail over her face, stepped between the two voice, which Snipe thought he knew, almen, and whimpered, in a very low tone—so | though he could not connect it with the tall, low that the detective was obliged to stoop | stately, staid-looking man who was standing at his side, and who had come from he could "I have lost my pocketbook, and I do not | not tell where. "Take the boy away someknow my way about New York. Could you | where, and send him down to the crib, and

For answer the tall, staid gentleman emitted a low whistle, and Billy the Bowler ap-The detective looked keenly into the old | peared as suddenly as if he had sprung out

"You there, Billy? Vhere did you come from?" asked the Israelite. "I thought you vas lost, too. You never come back when I sent you to see about that beesness."

"Never mind about that. Here, Billy; take this Snipe down to Baxter street, and take care he doesn't get away again. We have had trouble enough with him."

"Yes, an' you an' de oder mugs will have more trouble before I am t'rough wid yer," muttered the lad.

"Vhat you say, my tear?" asked the Jew. whose cars were so quick he never missed anything that was said in his presence.

"Never mind, Morris, what I said. It's noding ter do wid you."

"I'll make it something to do with me," replied the Israelite spitefully, as he pinched the boy's arm again, a little harder than before. The other man, who had been watching this little by-play impatiently, pulled the boy away and handed him to Billy the Bowler, who took the boy by the collar with a grip that indicated his intention of not loosing it again in a hurry.

"That will do. Take him away."

The Bowler dragged Snipe away in the darkness, and then the tall, staid gentleman, who would have been recognized by the banker, had he been there, as Mr. Harris, turned to the Jew and whispered in his ear,. in hurried, carnest tones:

"To-night, my tear?" "To-night? Now!"

"But, my tear, is it safe?" asked the Jew, who had pulled down his vail, and was now as much like an unsophisticated old lady as ever.

"It must be safe. I will make it safe." "Murtherin' Moses! Vhat a man you are!" exclaimed the Jew, raising his hands "I-I-am afraid I shall get out of in his favorite gesture of surprised admira-

The Serpent did not answer him, and tak-The guide did as he was requested, and ing him by the arm, led him along Fifth avenue, with the air of a man assisting a. feeble old lady, that amused Morris Cohen mightily, although he did not make any remark.

It was not much of a walk before the Serpent stopped in front of the banker's house.

and ascending the high flight of steps, rung the bell, drawing the Jew with him. "My tear, vhat are ve going to do?" asked Morris, in considerable trepidation. "You follow my lead. That is all you have to do." "All right, my tear. Vhatever you say,

"Of course it does. You should know that by this time."

Five minutes later the two worthies were as he could speak. "What do yer want ter sitting in the banker's library, with the banker in his favorite attitude, leaning back in his easy-chair. The Serpent could not help glancing at the bookcase, where were and vail, and pulled them off, together with as if the poor fellows who do not know where the curtains behind which the detective had the gray wig, revealing the Jew, in all his to get their next meal or a bed, like to keep been concealed a few hours before, and native hideousness, and with a decidedly near the people that have all the comforts where he had received a blow on the fore- bewildered expression on his anything but and luxuries of life. head that the Serpent thought would quiet handsome features. him for a day or two, but which he had had the evidence of his own eyes had not prevented the detective walking down-town, and appearing on Broadway, as if nothing had happened.

"This is Mrs. Harris, your mother, is it, Mr. Harris?" the banker was saying, as he looked closely at the vailed figure of Morris Cohen.

Yes, poor old lady. She is not used to company, and therefore she prefers to keep her vail down," explained the Serpent, smoothly.

"Ah!" grunted the banker.

"Doesn't believe it, I can see," comment in as I was passing, to say that I have acquired other information about Jim Daly, the Serpent, and I know now, for certain, that the job will not be attempted for several weeks, at all events. He has taken passage for Europe in an assumed name, and can therefore not be here to operate on the Vantine bank for at least six weeks, and probably not then, because it is to be presumed that he has some business in his line to transact on the other of the Atlantic, or he would not be taking a long sea voyage in such an unpropitious month as February.

"Ah! grunted the banker, again, with his eyes fixed on the vailed face of the Jew, much to that gentleman's annoyance.

"Where is your son?" asked the Serpent. "He is down-stairs, Mr. Harris. But I do not think it necessary to trouble him about this matter now, since, as you say, nothing will be attempted for some weeks. I do not approve of talking about it to any one more than is absolutely necessary—not even to my son."

"Very wise, Mr. Vantine."

Morris Cohen, who forgot his assumed these fellows down, that I must have help." character for the moment, and spoke in his natural tone.

the other of his visitors as if asking what this meant.

said, politely.

"She said it was a very wise thing. My all, I vas. So help me!" mother is rather shrewd, and although of course she does not know anything about the detective business, she often gives me valuable advice, based on her sound com-. anon sense," interposed the Serpent, hastily.

"But—I thought she addressed me as 'my dear,' did she not?" said the banker, a slight smile curling the corner of his lip.

"No, Mr. Vantine. She was speaking to Although," added the Serpent, with a smile, "she might have addressed that endearing appellation to you. She is an old lady, you know, and, having always lived in the country, does not observe the conventionalities as closely as we are accustomed to in the city."

"V'at a gift of gab he vas got, to be his preparations to go away." sure," thought the Jew, but he did not "Yes, ve may as vell go avay," said the of "the great detective, Mr. Harris."

and the Serpent having found out all he served Walter, in obedience to a sign from wanted to know, that the banker had no his farther—that was noticed by the Serpent, suspicion of his own identity, or that there | however, although the banker did not know was a plan to rob the bank that very night, it. was about to take his leave, when there was a diversion that changed things slightly.

Walter Vantine came into the room, rather suddenly, and noticing the Serpent, started, while a frown gathered over his face—a frown that his father saw, although he pretended that he did not.

"Here's Mr. Harris, Walter," observed his Inther.

"And Mrs. Harris, the mother of Mr.

Harris added the banker.

man, who was making an awkward bow, as of young men on their way down-town, a she sat in her chair, and then, moved by beggar or two, and here and there one of some impulse that he could not explain, | those shabby-genteel figures that are all too

CHAPTER XIX. THE SERPENT FOILED.

One peculiar result of the sudden exposure of the identity of Morris Cohen, in the guise of Mrs. Harris, was that there were three weapons drawn on the instant.

Morris Cohen was taken too much by surprise to do anything but sit in his chair, in a discomfitted heap. But the Serpent, who was never known to be nonplused in what- | this thing." ever situation he might find himself, had drawn a six-shooter from his hip-pocket in a moment, and was holding it now, con ed the Serpent, inaudibly. "I must look | banker or his son could see it, but ready for | about yourself. We are all in the same busiout. This is getting dangerous." Then he instant use, nevertheless. He was a master said, aloud: "I thought I would just drop in the use of the weapon, and could hit a silver dime at a hundred yards at any time, with the pistol held in any position. So, he knew that if occasion should arise, he had his weapon handy for use although appearing to hold it so carelessly.

The banker and his son did not make any attempt to hide either their suspicions or their weapons, but held them in full view.

The Serpent was the first to recover his equanimity. He threw himself into a chair, still with his revolver concealed in the hollow of his hand, and laughed loudly.

"Well done!" he cried. "Well done!" The Jew looked at him in surprise, while the banker resumed his scat, and waited for the Serpent to go on. As for Walter, he seemed to be ashamed of his precipitation, and leaned over the back of his father's chair, looking at the Jew with almost as much astonishment as Morris himself.

"You see, Mr. Vantine," went on the Serpent. "I wanted to test something."

"Ah!" grunted the banker.

"Yes. This gentleman is Mr. Morris, one of the smartest men on the New York detec-"Well?"

Mr. Morris is a useful man, but, unfor-The banker glanced quickly from one to tunately, he is known to all the crooked any time."

fraternity—"

"Yes, indeed, my tear," broke in Morris. "I thought you spoke, Mrs. Harris," he | "The Ser-I mean, Mr. Harris, speaks the Bible truth, he does. I vas known to them

"So I got Mr. Morris to assume a disguise, and I wanted to see whether it was a cheek." good one. I thought it would be a good idea to bring him up here, and see whether you had any suspicions that he was anything but an old lady."

"Ah!" grunted the banker, again.

"But my impetuous young friend, Walter, spoiled it before I had a thorough opporme, I think. I am her son, you know. tunity of finding out whether there was anything in the appearance of my mother, Mrs. Harris, to suggest Mr. Morris, the detective. Do you see?"

"I see," nodded the banker.

torn from him.

Things were progressing very smoothly, "I will walk a little way with you," ob-

"Very well, Walter. Don't stay out late," said the banker, as the three left the room and the house.

They walked for perhaps two blocks before any of the three spoke. Walter was might have been observed, kept very close to him. Could it be possible that they were afraid of his trying to escape from their fas-"Good-evening, Mr. Harris," said Walter. | cinating company? It certainly might have been supposed so.

They had reached a quiet corner, where The voung man glanced at the old wo- no one was passing save an occasional group Walter Vantine snatched Morris's bonnet common in the upper part of the metropolis,

The Serpent looked up and down, and then, bending his face down so that his lips were close to Walter's ear, he whispered:

"The job has to be done to-night!" The young man started, as if he would have run away, but the Serpent caught him by the arm in an iron grip, and detained

"Don't be idiotic, Walter Vantine. You know that I have you, now, just where I want you, and that you must help us with "You scoundrel!" hissed Walter.

"Don't be uncomplimentary, Walter, because when you say anything about me, in cealed by his hand, so that neither the the way of 'scoundrels,' you are talking ness, you know."

"Yes, all in the same business, my tear," put in the Jew.

"What am I to do?"

"Very simple. Take us into the bank." "And if I refuse?"

"You will not refuse," rejoined the Serpent, with his ugly smile. "How do you know?" "Because you could not save yourself. I have your confession." The young man laughed, scornfully. "Of what use would that be if the bank is not robbed? That very fact would prove that it was forced from me under fear of my

"Or fear of disgrace."

"Ha, ha! But you have overreached yourself this time, Mr. Daly. The paper that might have disgraced me is destroyed." "Is it?" said the Serpent, significantly.

"Certainly it is. Did I not burn it myself, before your eyes?" asked Walter, looking closely into the Serpent's face to see whether he suspected that the young man of the trick that had been played upon him.

"You are a pretty smart young man, "Very wise, my tear," burst out from tive force. I found, when I began to run Walter Vantine, but you are not a match for Jim Daly. The check you burned was not the one you forged. I have that quite safe, and can produce it if it is required, at

> Although Walter could not repress a slight shiver when he found how accurately Cool Bob had read the scheme of the Serpent, he pretended to be surprised, and then said, doubtfully:

"I do not believe you. Show me the

The Serpent put his hand to the inside pocket of his long Prince Albert, which in his character of Mr. Harris, he wore closely buttoned, when he felt a tug at his coat-tails, and met the eager gaze of Morris Cohen, who had been keeping a wary eye on the young man.

"I guess it isn't necessary to show it to you, Walter. I have it. That should be enough for you. But, I promise you, that when this job is done, I will know it is the right one. Moreover, when the whole affair "So, now, having finished my talk with is over, and I amout of the reach of the you, Mr. Vantine, I will go down-town, police of New York, I will send you your and see that the Serpent really is making | confession, as well, so that you will be doubly safe. And I am a man of my word."

"Indeed he is, my tear. You may know speak again for a while, and the banker ap- | Jew, who seemed rather anxious to get out | that when the Serpent says anything, he peared to be satisfied with the explanation of the house, now that his disguise had been means it. I would trust him anywhere," added the Jew, in whining tones that he meant to be convincing.

Walter could hardly restrain his disgust, and Morris Cohen was within a hair's breadth of receiving a very vigorous thump, but he did not get it, because Walter recognized that it would be foolish to have a row now. He must appear to acquiesce, and save the bank, as well as his own honor, at the same time—if he could.

What worried Walter was to know what between the Jew and the Serpent, who, it had become of the detective. He had not seen him since he left the house, after declaring that he had accidentally knocked his head against the corner of the bookcaseraising a rather serious wound for so slight a blow as he said it was by the way—and he felt that he needed his advice sorely now. Where could the detective be?

Perhaps the Serpent and Morris Cohen were thinking the same thing. But if they were, they did not betray it in their manner. On the contrary, they appeared to be per-feetly satisfied with the appearance of everything, and as if their only desire was to reach the bank as soon as possible.

They walked swiftly, with Walter between them, and soon they stood on the corner opposite the bank while the Serpent and Morris reconnoitered.

"Now, Walter, you have a key of the laugh. front door. Open it and let us in. Morris, you will stay out here. I do not know that an outside watch is absolutely necessary, but I never neglect precautions."

"All right, my tear. It is only a little after ten o'clock, and no one vill suspect a poor old lady, who vas looking out on the street from the doorway. They vill only think I vas the housekeeper."

As the Jew spoke, he went up the steps of a handsome residence opposite the bank, and stood in the shadow of the doorway, where he could not be discerned unless he never particularly clear, and were more con- pent should have cause to complain of his was looked at very closely, and where, as fused now than usual. he said, a casual glance would suggest only "I s'pose I'll have to get a bloomin' cab, that he was a housekeeper or upper servant | an' then that old sheeny will make me pay who had stepped outside the door for a for it. '() wever, there ain't nothing else I breath of the keen, wintry air.

"But, if I go into the bank, what are you going to do?" asked Walter. "I shall go with you."

Walter did not reply, but passed up the steps to the bank, and tapped gently.

"What is that for?" asked the Serpent. himself. "Has your father put on another watchman?"

"Certainly. You do not suppose he would leave the bank entirely unprotected, do you?"

The door was unlocked and unbolted from the inside with considerable noise, and a | head off." man's face appeared in the opening, the eyes looking inquiringly and suspiciously at the two men outside.

"It is I-Walter Vantine," said Walter. The watchman did not say anything, but swung the door wide open, so that Walter and the Serpent could pass in.

"This is a detective," observed the young and I mean to keep him company."

The Serpent dragged Walter out of sight | to see anything particularly strange in it.

of the watchman, and muttered:

"If you are not doing the square thing, look out!"

"I am."

"You were to let us into the bank with a ass-key, and now I find a watchman here. Who is he?"

"I do not know. My father hired him. All I know about him is that he must have come well recommended, or he would not be in this building."

"We must get him out of the way." "You will have to do it yourself. I have fulfilled my part of the contract in letting you into the bank. I did not bargain to commit murder, or do violence, and I will down Fifth avenue. not do it," replied the young man, coolly.

The Serpent looked over in the direction of the watchman, who, with his gray hair and whiskers, and his rather bent form, did not look a likely man to count much in a ling to get a nap. fight. He had sunk into a chair near the front door, and appeared to be dozing.

"Now is the time," muttered the Serpent. the old watchman, and pausing behind him, as he sat with his head drooping over upon his breast, and his breath coming and going in deep and regular cadence, raised a small black jack with murderous intent.

It seemed as if nothing could save the unconscious man, when, just as the black jack had actually begun to descend, he swung around in his chair, and, without any apparent exertion, caught the weapon in his right hand, and twisted it out of Jim Daly's grasp so suddenly and vigorously as to make the Serpent fairly cry out with pain.

"What's the matter?" yawned the watchman, seemingly half asleep.

CHAPTER XX. THE BOWLER CAUGHT NAPPING.

WHEN Billy the Bowler marched Guttersnipe down-town with his hand on his collar he realized that he had rather a troublesome job on his hands. He could not hold the how all the way down-town without exciting comment, and yet he was afraid to let him ", for a mount. for the youngster was as out of the job. slippery at an ed, as le well knew.

had over Billy the Bowler, and he was grin- Barney took charge of the cab, and drove in ning to himself as he saw the embarrassment | a down-town direction. of his enemy.

all der way down to der Bowery and Baxter street, are we?" he asked, with a short

"Shut up, yer young snipe, or I'll break Bowler.

"What good would dat do yer? Der Serpent would smash yer if yer did any damage ter me now. I'm his property, don't yer know, an' yer has ter handle me wid care, an' don't yer forgit it," was Guttersnipe's then. cheerful response.

Billy the Bowler recognized the force of this argument, and he stood still for a mo-can do, blow it!" muttered Billy.

Guttersnipe's cars were very sharp, and he caught the purport of his companion's halfspoken observations, and enjoyed his discomfiture with a keenness that was natural to him, in whatever situation he might find

"Gein' ter ride us down in a cab, ch? Well, dat's der right way ter take a gentleman," laughed; the boy. "Here's a cab, right here. Shall I call it?"

"Shut up, while yer safe," growled Billy. "I'd give a dollar ter knock yer bloomin"

"Couldn't be done at der price," responded Snipe. "Make it a hundred, spot cash, an' I'll go yer." The Bowler did not reply to this badinage, but held up his hand as a signal to the driver of a hansom cab that was passing, and the vehicle drew up to the curb.

man, in a low tone, without looking at the the collar, and shoved him into the cab in the lid. The consequence was that he watchman. "He is to stay here all night, a very unceremonious manner, the driver sneezed and coughed violently immediately watching the proceeding without appearing

> "Kid trying to run away from his folks?" he asked, carelessly.

"Yes," grunted Billy. "Drive down the Bowery to Baxter street."

" All right."

a corner with his knee, so that he could let; bling about the street in a very undignified go of his collar.

There was some delay in the starting of | too many saloons for his health. the cab, and Billy was trying to figure out how he could push up the little flap over his head to see what the matter was without his spasm of coughing. risking the loss of his charge, when the horse turned around and the cab bowled rapidly

"I'll soon have you safe in the bloomin' crib, an' then I'll be done with yer," grunted Billy, as he looked at the innocent Snipe up in his corner, where he was apparently try-what caused the delay in the starting of the cab. The fact is that there was a change of der cab." Like a cat he crawled over the floor toward drivers. The cabman took the Bowler's direction, and was about to whip up his horse, when a man sprung upon the footboard by > his side and whispered in his ear. "Hallo, Barney. That you?"

"Whist!" returned Barney Doran, for he it was. "Don't give it away. Oi'll take this fare, an' you can go an' git a slape Oi've been aif all day, an' Oi'm ready to go to wurrk."

"Glad to hear it. This is your cab anyhow, but I was afraid you would not show up till the morning."

"Well, Oi had some business av me own, but it's done now, an' you can have the benefit av me bein' here."

morning, on account of Barney's unusual ab- recognized. sence, and was only too happy to be released. He did not know that there was anything he yawned loudly, as if he had been half out of the way with his fare, or that Barney | asleep. had any more reason for wanting to drive | "What's that?" asked Billy, quickly, his

So, just & Tilly the Lowler, inside the Guttersnipe appreciated the advantage he cab, was preparing to push up the flap, "Begorra! Oidostroike luck sometimes," "Say, Bowler, we ain't going to walk it he muttered, as he drove down town in a business-like way.

Billy the Bowler was in blissful unconsciousness that his enemy was handling the reins over his head, and Guttersnipe was so yer bloomin' frontispiece," growled Billy the busy trying to devise some plan of escape that he did not think anything about the cabman He was thinking about Barney, but he had no idea that his Irish friend was so near. If he had there would have been a lively time for the Bowler right there and

Billy kept a watchful eye on the boy, for he had had experience of the slipperiness of that young gentleman, and he was determent to collect his thoughts, which were mined that neither Morris Cohen nor the Ser-negligence.

As for Barney, he was thinking pretty steadily of what he was to do. Although he knew that the expected destination of the cal was the Baxter street dive, he had no intention of going there, and his only desire was to think out some plan by which he could get the Bowler safely into the hands of the detective.

"Be Paddy Murphy's ghost, if the captain was only here now, Oi'd be saved all further throubble. Be meself Oi don't know what to do, 'cept that Oi won't let this t'ief av the wurrld get away from me. Oi must let thot b'ye know who's droivin' him, somehow, an' then p'rhans he'll be helping me to fix things. Oi'd as soon hove that kid as mony a man Oi know. Be gob, he's as sharp as a blackthorn, an' just about as tough."

As he paid this compliment to the lad, he carefully raised the flap in the roof of the cab and looked down.

Billy the Bowler had lighted a large and very strong cigar, and was puffing a cloud of rank black smoke that caught Barney Billy took the boy with a firmer grip on full in the mouth and nostrils as he raised over the head of Billy the Bowler.

"What the bloomin' deuce are you doin' up there?" demanded the Bowler, as Barney let the flap fall with a loud clap. The Bowler emphasized his inquiry by pokin up the flap with his cane, so that he could see Barney still coughing and choking, The Bowler was seated in the cab by this while the horse, temporarily released from time, and had wedged the boy tightly into the guiding hand of the driver, was wobmanner; suggestive of a man who had visited

> "What's the matter, ch?" repeated Billy. "Phwat's thot?" asked Barney, between

"I asked you what made yer open this flap and cough on me bloomin' 'ead," returned

"Phwy, Oi was goin' ter ask you phwere Oi was ter droive ver to, thot's all."

"I told yer, Baxter street."

"But you didn't tell me phwat number." "What a lovely brogue that chump's got It may be interesting to the reader to know | all at once," muttered Snipe, to himself. "He didn't talk dat way when we got inter

> "Never mind about the bloomin' number," exclaimed the Bowler, impatiently. "Get us down to Baxter street, an' I'll show you > the house." "Well, don't blame me if I take you past the place," grumbled Barney, still holding the flap open.

> "Go to the devil!" roared the Bowler, impatiently, as he pulled at his big cigar.

> "Phwere shall Oi find him-in land street?" persisted B rney, who had his own reasons for prolonging the conversation.

> "You'll find him right in the cab, if you don't shut up and drive on," retorted Billy the Bowler, threateningly.

Barney did not answer, but he placed his The other man needed no persuading to face close to the little opening, and grinned get out of the seat, and resign the reins to at the training The lay greet and answer Barney. He had been at work since early ing snicker, and Barney knew that he was

"Oh, Fourteenth street," il Snip. as them than to make the money he would get suspicions aroused in a moment. "What did you say about Fourteenth street?"

"Oh, give us a rest! I was just a-dreaming about a mash I used to have down dere. Dat's all. Can't a feller dream in this cab?"

"Not out loud," replied Billy, as he gave the boy a smart rap on the head with his cane.

hot-tempered, and when the Bowler hit him Barney, who was looking on, laughed heartily, but silently.

a passion. "You'll hit me in the bloomin' softly to Barney.

jaw, will yer?"

With these words he struck the lad on the cheek with his open hand, and immediately there was a first-class fight in progress in the narrow confines of the cab. The small | during the performance of Guttersnipe. | space proved an advantage to the boy, for nimble, got under his big assailant's guard, knew this, but he felt that it would not be ! and gave him several good hard punches that did Guttersnipe's heart good, in proportion to the discomfiture of Billy the Bowler.

How the struggle would have ended, it is impossible to say, although probably with the ignominious defeat of Guttersnipe, if Billy had not seen that the fracas had attracted the attention of a six-foot policeman, who was making his way to the cab as fast as he could run.

"Drive on, quick!" shouted the Bowler to Berney. "Here's a cop coming over."

Barney did not want to have his fare arrested at that moment, because he did not know how it would agree with the plans of the detective, so he whipped his horse and bowled away down Fifth avenue at a pace that would have given the policeman a sharp race had he attempted to follow. Like a turned into Fourteenth street. sensible man, however, he decided that the offense of fighting in a cab was not serious enough to demand that he should run halfa-dozen blocks at the top of his speed, so he reply of the gamin. let it go, and sought the back door of a saloon for a comforting nip of something hot | Fourteenth street at a deliberate pace, as | and swerved from one side to the other, and and strong that was just what he considered | will appear later. he wanted for a February night.

drove down that thoroughfare at a good denly whispered to the driver to stop. speed till he reached Union Square. He | Barney pulled up, and the boy watched sudden twist of the cab sent him flying from turned around the end and into Fourth Billy the Bowler anxiously, to see whether one side of the seat to the other, and his head avenue. He was thinking of what the boy the stopping of the vehicle had disturbed had said about Fourteenth street, and he him in his sleep. The burly fellow moved was satisfied that it was not a dream, but a | slightly, and grunted something, but he did wide-awake hint to him that was meant.

very vigilant, but after his struggle with the boy, he felt a strong desire stealing over him to take a nip. He had taken several nips of strong drink during the night to keep the cold out and to brace him up for his work, as he would have explained himself, and this, together with the exertion of struggling with the boy in the cab, had made him very tired.

"I'll have to keep awake, though," he muttered. "This kid is on the lookout for a chance to get out of the bloomin' cab, and if he ever gets away, it will be all day for me with the Serpent and Morris Cohen, and they know too much about me for me to awake."

His strong eigar was still between his lips, but he had let it go out. He lighted it again, and puffed away determinedly for a few minutes, but still the insidious slumber crept over him.

"Maybe this cigar makes me sleepy," he thought, and the cigar was thrown out into the street. He looked at the boy, who was apparently sleeping away in the corner. Certainly he was snoring in a manner that would have done credit to any sleeper.

Billy shook him violently, but the Snipe was too far gone to be affected. A slight grunt, and then he fell over into his old position again, like a bag of rags.

"Dunno whether he is shamming or not, but I shall keep awake anyhow. It won't take long to run down to Baxter street from here."

He looked out, and saw that they were passing along Union Square, and he was satisfied with the look of things generally.

of all these things, he did just what he had ter save his life now's his time." made up his mind not to do-fell fast asleep.

Guttersnipe remained perfectly quiet for enjoyment of the scheme. Guttersnipe was only a boy, but he was at least five minutes after he felt certain that his guard was asleep, while the cab went dewith his cane he shot out his small bony fist liberately down Fourth avenue. Then, when and gave his burly companion a bang in the he was satisfied that there was not the chin that made all his teeth rattle, while | slightest danger of the Bowler waking, he carefully pulled himself out of the corner into which he had been wedged, and, pushing "You young skunk!" spluttered Billy, in | up the flap in the roof of the cab, called

> CHAPTER XXI. EXIT BILLY THE BOWLER.

BILLY THE BOWLER snored unconsciously just when dere's work ter be done." When the burly tough once got to sleep he full force, while the lad, being small and extraordinary to wake him. Guttersnipe back here." safe to take any chances, so he was very cautious in his communication with Barney. and leaned against the fence attached to the trap Barney bent his head so that his ear was within two inches of the boy's mouth, and grunted: "Phwell?"

"That you, Barney?"

"Indade it is. Who else should it be?"

"Well, der mug's asleep."

"Good! Now, phwat?"

"Drive along East Fourteenth street till I tell you to stop."

"You're a cheeky kid. But, be gob, you know more than lots of men," was Barney's | being done. response, as he obediently turned his horse around and made his way to Fourteenth | done yet," commented Guttersnipe to himstreet."

"Give yer ordhers."

"You kin bet dat's what I'm doin'. I'm an' den dere will be a spill, sure enough. running dis shooting match," was the cool | He's a-goin' it."

Barney soon turned into Broadway, and boy looked carefully at the houses, and sud- could have slumbered in it.

Billy the Bowler had been trying to be him that he did not, for Guttersnipe had possessed himself of Billy's heavy cane, and had made up his mind to bestow a whack on the Bowler's head that would have made him sleep a little sounder for an hour or two.

As soon as he saw that his companion was safe, the boy stepped carefully over him, and leaped out of the cab.

"Dat's enough of cab-riding for me, Barney," observed the boy, as he looked up at Barney with a grin.

"Phwat are we goin' ter do here, Snipe?"

asked Barney.

be safe. He makes himself too numerous, ment. I've got der idee," he exclaimed, with a broader grin than ever on his face.

"An' phwat is it?"

Snipe stepped up on the bar at the back of the cab, so that he could whisper to Barney, and explained the plan:

"He's dead asleep, an' he don't know where he is. You start up der horse, and drive like the deuce down the street, from side to side, and make a great yellin'."

" Phwell?"

"Hully chee! How dumb some mugs are!" exclaimed the boy, in a disgusted tone. "Don't yer see? He'll wake up wid der racket, an' he won't know what's goin' on. But he'll t'ink der horse has run away, an' dat he'll be smashed up. He won t be wide awake ter remember dat I ougnt to be wid him, an' he won't care a cent. All he'll want will be ter git out. See?"

"Faith, Oi begin ter sec."

So he leaned back in the cab to cogitate you could see anything without a telescrip," I tions, however, and he leaned forward, holdon what Morris and the Serpent meant to responded the boy, with bitter sarcasm, that ing on tightly the while, until he could see a do with the boy, and when that bank job was all lost on Barney, however. "Well, good chance to get out.

was to be done, and what new work there when he gets good and scared, you siack up would be for him when this bother with a little, and yell ter him ter jump. Tell Guttersnipe was over, and while thinking him you can't hold der horse, an' if he wants

Barney gave vent to a hoarse laugh in his

"Shut yer music-box, will yer!" cried the boy, in disgusted tones. "What der yer want ter let a cackle like dat out of yer for. It sounded like a car off der track. Ain't yer got no sense?"

"I forgot," answered Barney humbly, for he began to think the diminutive individual by his side was gifted with more than human powers and he respected him accordingly.

"Well, yer want ter remember. I hate ter see a mug make a cussed fool of himself

"I won't do it ag'in, Snipe." "Mind yer don't. Now, drive away, an' Billy the Bowler had no room to strike with | slept soundly, and it required something | when you've spilled der mug, come right

"All roight!"

The gamin stepped down to the sidewalk, As soon as the boy whispered through the house like others on Fourteenth street in that neighborhood. Barney turned his horse around, and with a whoop sent the horse dashing down the street, at a learing gait.

> One or two sleepy policemen who were strolling along or sitting in the back rooms of saloons heard the noise of the wheels and the rattling of the horse's hoofs, but they supposed it was some young fellows out for a lark, and they did not trouble themselves to give chase, so long as there was no damage

"Dat's der most sensible t'ing dat mug has self, as he watched the cab, and saw that "Drive slow," directed Snipe, as they Barney was obeying his directions, and drivling from one side to the other. "Gosh! he'll turn dat cab over first t'ing he knows,

Barney was indeed carrying out his in-Guttersnipe had his reasons for going along structions. The cab bumped and jumped, it would have been a miracle indeed if even When they reached Third avenue, the such a sound sleeper as Billy the Bowlec

A particularly pronounced bumb, and a came in contact with one of the windowframes with a crash that brought him into a state of partial wakefulness, while at the not wake up. Perhaps it was as well for same time confusing the few ideas he pos-

> "What the bloomin' jumpin' Jerusalem is this?" he growled, as another twist of the cab banged him against the other side, and shook him up so that his ribs felt as if they were being hammered with a base-ball bat.

> Barney heard this remark through the trap in the roof, and he grinned as he laid the whip on his horse lightly and gave him another pull to one side.

Billy the Bowler by this time realized that he was in a cab, although he had forgotten all about Guttersnipe and his mission to con-"I'll show you direckly," answered the vey him to the Baxter street crib. He was lad. "Don't be in a hurry. What are we being hustled so lively that it would indeed goin' ter do with dat mug in der cab? I'd have been a wonder if he had any clear idea take any chances. Yes, I must keep like to put him somewhere where he would of anything except his present predica-

A few more bumps, harder than ever, made him try to get to his feet, as he pushed the doors of the vehicle open.

He tried to cry out to Barney, but his breath was all gone, and he could only gasp and try to hold on. Suddenly, he distinguished the voice of the driver over his head.

"Jump out! Oi can't hould him! He's got cl'ane away from me!" he heard Barney say, through the jolting and rattling of the cab and the irregular trampling of the horse's hoofs.

There was no cessation of the swerving of the cab, which kept on dashing from side to side as if possessed by a thousand fiends. But Billy the Bowier had got it firmly fixed in his head that his play was to get out, and he was not disposed to neglect what he conceived to be his plain duty.

He could not jump out while the horse "Do yer? Smart, you are! I didn't think | and cab were performing such reculiar gyra-

"Look out below there," cried Barney. "Oi'll thry to pull him up a little just so as yez can jump out, an' yez don't want to waste any toime about it, neither."

"I won't!" responded Billy the Bowler. Barney grinned to himself, for he had taken care never to lose control of his horse through all the dashing down the street, and he pulled suddenly and firmly on the reins, so that the cab actually stopped, all in an instant.

Billy the Bowler hardly needed to jump, for the jerk threw him bodily out of the cab, and if he had not been pretty active, he would have gone on his head, which, it may be remarked, was the benevolent desire of Barney Doran. But Billy was too quick in his movements for that, and he dropped on his feet, in a very dazed and shaken up condition, while Barney, turning his horse was no immediate likelihood of a deadly asswiftly, went back toward the place at which sault upon the young man, sunk into his not racing so wildly as he had been doing for with his eyes bent sharply upon the other Billy the Bowler's benefit.

The Bowler stood in the same spot for perhaps ten minutes before he could collect his ideas at all, and then, as he realized that he had lost Guttersnipe and his cane, it began to dawn upon him that he had been the victim of a conspiracy, although he could not, for the life of him, understand how it had been carried out. "That bloomin' kid is a near relation to Old Nick, I'm sure," he muttered. "Now, what am I goin' ter say to Morris and ter the Serpent? They'll have me in the Tombs, in revenge, as sure as my name is Bowles." He stood in silent cogitation for a little while longer, and then he made up his mind what to do. "I'll just gird up my bloomin' loins and go ter Chicago. I may be able ter find a job or two ter do there, an' I'll be out of the way of the Serpent an' Morris till this thing blows over. They'll say I'm a chump, an' no use to 'em, an' I know what that means. They will just give me away ter the police in their sneaking way, an' that will be the last of Billy the Bowler for a stretch. don't want to spend the next ten years at Sing Sing, an' I don't mean ter do it if I can help it."

As Billy the Bowler will not appear again in this narrative, it may be well to say here that he kept to his resolution. He had plenty of money in his pockets, and he took an early morning train for Chicago

While the Bowler was making his arrangements, as he stood where Barney had dumped him out of the cab, Barney himself was driving rapidly away to rejoin Guttersnipe.

As he neared the spot, which he had carefully noted before driving away, he uttered an expression of mingled surprise and admiration.

"Be jabers! That bye is a wonderful gossoon! If he hasn't made a mash, may Oi never see ould Bally gooran an' me ould mither # B '(00) "

Sure enough, Guttersnipe was leaning over the iron fence, in earnest conversation with a young woman, who seemed deeply interested in what he was saying to her.

CHAPTER XXII.

AN AWFUL SURPRISE.

where we left several of our friends ready for business according to their respective ideas of what constituted it.

The Serpent had received a rather surprising set-back when the watchman repelled . his attack so suddenly and effectively, and for a moment he stood watching the old me to do that?" man, as he leaned back in his chair yawning and stretching, as if unaware that he had given the Serpent such a surprise.

"Well, that is only one more argument in favor of clearing the bank of every one who is likely to interfere with the work," muttered the Serpent.

"What did you say?" asked Walter, carelessly, from his seat on the sofa, in the private room of his father.

The Serpent stepped over to him, and whispered fiercely in his ear:

"There seems to be some sort of treachery That watchman is one too many for 123."

perturbable comment.

"Yes. Well, he must be put out of the way. And, if I see any sign that you are not doing the square thing, look out for yourself!"

Jim Daly spoke savagely through his set teeth, and at the same time he drew a for- ber midable-looking bowie-knife from a pocket inside his coat and flashed it before the young man's eyes.

The young man did not wince, but it the Serpent had not had his back turned toward the watchman, he might have seen that the old man made a sudden start forward at the appearance of the knife, as if half inclined to interfere. But he didn't. The Serpent dropped the hand holding the knife to his side, and the watchman, as if satisfied that there | face. he had left Guttersnipe, at a good pace, but chair again, in his former listless manner, but room and threw himself upon the sofa. two, not withstanding.

> "You hear what I say?" hissed the Serænt.

"I hear you," returned the young man,

"And you are in the job with us?" "How can I help it? You say you have me in your power, and you ought to know." "And so I have, curse you!" growled the Serpent, as he put his knife out of sight. "That's nice language to use to a fellow that is supposed to be your pal in an important job like this," said Walter, still in the same bantering tone.

The Serpent bent a fierce glance upon the young fellow, as if he would like to have burned a hole through him, but Walter took no notice of it save to smile in a careless manner that was almost maddening to the other, because he did not know what to make of it.

The Serpent kept up a bold front, because it was natural to him, but he was in a quandary, for he did not know how to dispose of | can see whether the old man has gone after this watchman. He had discovered that the the police." old man was much stronger than might have; The Serpent went to the window and been supposed, and he feared that in a hand- looked out. There stood the watchman on to-hand struggle with him, the watchman the steps in the doorway, with his overcoat, would at least contrive to make so much that he had worn loose while in the bank, noise that he would attract attention outside, and the result might be the interference of police, and the capture of himself, as well as the defeat of his purpose to rob the bank.

He could not expect much assistance from Walter Vantine, that was clear, for the young mandid not seem to be as much afraid + in his feminine garments, watching the bank of him as he had been, and might refuse to ; patiently, and perhaps wondering why the help him altogether, for anything he could

There was the vault before him, but he be a tremendous job to force it, even if he ter. had felt disposed to do so. No! Walter

He did not finish the thought, but abruptly, let his hand fall upon the hilt of his bowie-knife, signifying to himself what would be the consequence to Walter in case of his continuing obstinate.

"Walter," he said, at last, in a low tone, so that the watchman should not hear.

.. 11. 11... "Will you show me the combination?"

response. WE must return to the Vantine Bank, The Serpent was suspicious, and this change it since."

ready acquiescence seemed to him as ominous as a direct refusal. "Um! It was understood that you were to do it, but I thought-" "That I was going back on my word!" interrupted Walter. . "Did you ever know

"You wouldn't help me with the old.man over there," said the Serpent, nodding his head in the direction of the watchman.

"There is a difference between doing a lit." job in a bank for money and committing murder, or even a murderous assault!"

"Burn my heart if I can understand your nice distinctions," grumbled the Serpent. "But something has to be done with him, or he'll spoil everything."

"I'll get him out of the way."

"You?" cried the Serpent, in greater astonishment than ever.

"That's what I said."

"So it seems," was Walter Vantine's im | puzzle!" And the breathless manner in which the Serpent made this remark, showed that he meant what he said.

The young man made no reply, but stepping over to the watchman, he shook him roughly. The only response was a snore. The old man had dropped into a sound slum-

"That will do," exclaimed Jim Daly. "If he is asleep, I can fix him myself."

He was moving toward the watchman again, when Walter Vantine turned on him savagely, in a way altogether different from the coolness he had displayed ever since coming into the bank.

"Touch this old man, Jim Daly, and I'll kill you!" he hissed, as he drew a six-shooter and held it with the muzzle in the Serpent's

The Serpent started back, and, with a shrug of his shoulders, went into the private

Walter replaced his pistol in his pocket, and shook the watchman again, who awoke immediately and looked inquiringly into the young man's face.

Walter whispered a few words in his ear, and he walked to the front door and stepped outside, the young man closing the door after him and shooting one of the heavy

The Serpent started up.

"Oh, no, Mr. Walter. That won't do! You must think I'm a fool. Do you suppose I don't see through such a transparent trick as that?"

"What do you mean?"

"What do I mean? Why, that you have sent that old man after the police, and that you think I am to be caught like a rat in a trap. That's what I mean."

"Jim Daly, I begin to think you are a fool. As if I couldn't have put the police on you any time to-day, if I had thought fit to do so. Look out of this window, and you buttoned tightly around him. He was standing leaning against the door-post, in a listless attitude, as if waiting till he should be summoned inside. Across the street, in the doorway of the big residence, the Serpent could descry the form of Morris Cohen, old man had stepped outside.

"Satisfied?" asked Walter.

The Serpent was not quite satisfied, but he did not know the combination, and it would | said he was, and that was enough for Wal-

"Now to business," said Walter.

Vantine must be made to reveal it to him, |. The young man seemed to be as eager to help as he was reluctant a few minutes ago, as he stepped over to the vault and began to turn the combination knob, the Serpent alternately looking at him and glancing out of the window to make sure that the watchman was still there.

The young man worked away at the combination, but somehow he was not able to open the door.

"This is strange. I'm sure that I have "Certainly. That is what I am here for, the right combination, for I closed the door is it not?" was the young man's unexpected to-day, with my father looking over my shoulder, and there has been no one to

> The Serpent fingered his bowie-knife asked, suspiciously:

> "You are not playing any double game me, are you, Walter Vantine? It will bad thing for you, if you are."

The young man tossed his head imp ly, as he replied: "Jim Daly, I never break my word. tell you that I set the combination to-day, and that I am doing the best I can to

The Series Design & Add about the sail to PROBLEM CORRECT TO THE REAL PROPERTY AND ADDRESS OF THE PARTY AND ADDRE Orner - alegion de son since de la litera del litera de la litera de la litera de la litera de la litera de l descript out of the later, marked along the continue to the limit by the transfer of the recognition of the last Legislan in, Importantly:

"Here, I have try it. Perhap I comment age it myself."

"But you don't know the combination." "That's nothing. I have opened doors "Well, if you ain't worse than a Chinese before without knowing how they were La-tened till I listened. There is such a thing | up my mind dat I'd use what I learned three walked swiftly but cautiously around as hearing the tumblers drop, and being able | about der crowd dey run with ter fight 'em the corner until they could see the bank a to work it without any previous knowledge on der side of her law. Guttersnipe has block away. of the combination. Don't you know that, never been a t'ief, or a crook, an' he never; my innocent young friend?"

try it."

The Serpent bent down to the door and listened carefully, as he moved the great nickel-plated knob with a light and delicate touch, Walter Vantine watching him with a curious smile playing around his lips.

Had not the Serpent become so interested in the vault door, he might have gone to the window and looked out to see whether the watchman was still at his post on the steps. Had he done so, he would have found that obtain a hold on that fearful man, who callthe old man had disappeared. But he was too busy with the combination, and was therefore totally unaware of a proceeding that might mean danger to him.

tered, after some five minutes of futile work. would, just to git a piece of the cake, be "I seem to get close to it every once in a jabbers." while, but I can't quite make it. I can "Come hear some of the tumblers drop, but the door "You're one of dem mugs what tinks a felanything, Walter?"

"and I think the lock must have got out of ; ried, though I wouldn't mind casting in me | a house at dishere time of night widout dere order in some way."

"I guess you are right," agreed the Ser- was willin'." pent. "I'll give it another whirl, and if "We must wait a few years," laughed show on der outside whatever might be that don't do, we shall have to try some | Kate. "I want a husband that I can look | goin' on inside." nitro-glycerine."

"Whatever you say," assented the young | now, you know."

man, indifferently.

his face as he felt that he was approaching Billy the Bowler, and twice as ugly." success. His quick car caught the muffled sound of the machinery of the lock moving, and at last, with a cry of triumph, he found that he had accomplished the feat!

"Now for it, Walter!" he exclaimed, ex-ly.

ultantly.

a turn, and then, with all his strength, pulled you forgit it."

pistol, as the watchman walked out of the hours, and I don't know what's going on." vault, and looked into his eyes with a "Git interdat cab," commanded the boy, glance that seemed to pierce him through ignoring her question.

and through. clutched at the beard of this awful figure minding him that she had no hat on, but only was two old women in dat rig walkin' about tective!

CHAPTER XXIII. PLOTTING IN THE DARK.

to any experienced man of the world.

The girl was tall and handsome, and, bewith a patronizing smile that belongs na- | from the bank. turally to a grown young woman in the Barney did not know what all this meant, down, and then he withdrew as quietly as he company of a youngster. There was cer- but he had so much faith in the boy that he tainly no "mash" in the case, she regard- i did not even inquire what it meant. He ing Snipe as nothing more than a child. had his suspicions, but he was quite willing mugs, as I told yer we would. Me an' Cool for which he had an almost superstitious re-Bob is too much for anyting dey have down verence.

"I won't forget it, Snipe," responded the girl, in whom the reader has no doubt recog- "I believe dat bank job is being done ternized Kate Fairleigh. "You will be a great 'night, an' if it is, we'll find Captain Corden detective some day, if you don't allow yourself to be spoiled by those people in Baxter See?" street."

you ever know me ter do anyt'ing dat was ac- street, and Guttersnipe knew that they Barney went softly up the steps, the boy in tual crooked? Wasn't I allers held down in were in the vicinity of the bank. dat place, an' used only ter see dat dere! "Hitch yer horse, Barney, an' come I allers stop when dey wanted me ter go inter a job myself? Dey was not able ter make expedition. a crook of me, though dey tried hard enough. Someting allers held me back, an' I made and obeyed without a word. Then the it reached the head of the Irishman.

will be."

"That's so. I had forgotten your reputa- The boy spoke with unusual earnestness, tion as a combination expert. Go ahead and and there was a tear in Kate Fairleigh's eye to the fence that was only broken at interas she grasped him by the hand, and said:

"You are a good bey, and I, who was kept a prisoner in that hateful place so long, about the same way as they did you, and the only thing I can reproach myself with object, whether moving or stationary. is that I prevented Walter Vantine getting away from that ball-room the other night, and I did that only because Captain Corden had told me to do it, so that he might better ed himself the Serpent.

shaking hands on it. When is the wedding it out to be a woman. The woman was in "This is a pretty tough lock," he mut- | to be? O'd loike to be at the wedding, so Oi | black, with a large bonnet which partly con-off!" retorted Guttersnipe. won't open, all the same. Can't you do ler must be makin' love just 'cause he's talkin' ter a dame. Me an' Kate is old friends, "I have done all I can," was the answer, an' I don't know whether we'll ever be marlot wid her, as der novel-writers say, if she is someting crooked in it. Der bank looks up to, and I'm nearly a foot taller than you

"Dat don't make no difference," respond-The Serpent applied himself again to the ed Guttersnipe, valiantly. "I'd fight fer knob, and a look of satisfaction spread over | yer, just as much as if I was as big as | instant. Moving more cautiously than ever,

"Begorra, thot's roight. He's a dandy, so he is, an' Oi'd back him against Billy de Bowler, or any one loike him, if he was given a fair shake," declared Barney, warm-

"Dat's all right. I don't want no sich He seized the handle of the vault, gave it jolly as dat. Dere's work ter do, an' don't open the ponderous steel door. "What is it, Snipe? You know I've been | man moved uneasily, as if half-awake, and As he did so, he was confronted with a here with that young lady for twenty-four turned her face so that the full reflection of a

The girl was going to ask why, but she "Just what I tought," was Snipe's Miss Fairleigh on particular business.

where Guttersnipe was so comfortably en- | In less than five minutes the girl was in a corner, and Morris did not see him. gaged in conversation with the girl, and sitting in the cab, while Guttersnipe, after The Jew shook himself, and then seeking looked curiously at the couple, while Gutter- looking carefully around to make sure that his comfortable corner, snuggled up in it, snipe continued to talk with a freedom of the Bowler was not in the vicinity, ordered as if preparing for another doze. He felt airy badinage that would have done credit Barney to drive up-town as quickly as he satisfied that the Serpent was all right in to be running away, and to stop a block the job except to keep watch, he was not ing several years older than her talkative away from the Vantine bank, but out of bothering himself with anything beyond his companion, could listen to his conversation sight of any one who might be on the watch jown department.

"Well, Kate, we got away wid all der to trust to the gumption of Guttersnipe, dere in Baxter street, an' don't yer forget "Where are we going, Snipe?" asked him in a place of safety, and then go boldly Kate, who had too much woman's curiosity to take things as quietly as Barney.

somewhere about, an' he may want help.

"Yes," answered Kate, and said no more.

naturally into the position of captain of the

"Keep in der shadder of der houses,"

directed the gamin.

Like phantoms the three stole along close vals by a high flight of steps leading to the door of each of the great brown-stone mansions. The night had become very can sympathize with you. They used me in | dark, and when out of the glare of the electric lights, it was hard to distinguish any

> "Look out!" said the boy, suddenly, as: he made out a figure in the doorway at the corner. "Stay here a minute till I come back."

Without waiting for a response, the boy ran along swiftly by the fence till he was "Phwell, is it all settled?" broke in the so close to the house where the figure was voice of Barney Doran. "Oi see yez are standing in the doorway that he could make cealed her face, and she was leaning up in a corner against the door in such an attitude that the quick wit of the boy told him she was slumbering on her feet.

> "I've got to find out what you are doing dere," he muttered to himself. "It ain't natural fer a woman ter be standing outside all right, but den it wouldn't be likely ter

Guttersnipe was not lacking in cunning, and his mind was logical, even if he did not know what the word logic meant.

He made up his mind what to do on the he reached the foot of the high flight of steps, and tried to distinguish the features of the mysterious woman at the top.

"Durn her ugly picter. She is standin' sideways, so I can't see her face, but I'll sec it all the same," he muttered.

Slowly and cautiously he began to crawl up the long flight of steps. He had got a little more than half-way up when the wodistant electric lamp fell upon it.

The light was very dim, but it enabled him to distinguish the features of Morris Cohen!

Uttering a cry of deadly, superstitious had so much confidence in this waif of the mental comment. "On'y I wanted ter be fear, the Serpent put out his hand and streets, that she contented herself with re-\sure. I t'ought it would be funny if dere walking out of the blackness of the vault. a shawl thrown over her head, and that, dis part of New York. All right, my sheeny As he did so, the beard came away in his moreover, the dressmaker was up in her friend. I'll fix you dis time. You'll never hand, and Jim Daly, the Serpent, was look- room, waiting for her to get through with play yer tricks wid Guttersnipe any ing in the face of Cool Bob, the Twister De- her interview with the gentleman who had more, nor any one else except Inspector sent up word that he wanted to speak with Byrnes, if I have anyting to say, an' I t'ink ! I have."

"Dat's right," agreed the boy. "Go up- Morris Cohen had evidently awakened, for stairs, get your hat an' cloak, an' say good- he moved up and down on the broad stone BARNEY pulled up his horse at the spot by, and den come right down." step under the doorway, but Snipe crouched could make his horse go, without appearing; the bank, and as he had nothing to do with had come.

The boy waited until Morris had settled

"Say, here's somet'ing fer yer both ter do," he said, as he rejoined his companions. . In a few words he disclosed his plan, and Barney and Kate both entered into it heartily. It was to overpower Morris, and put to the bank and find out what was being done there, for Guttersnipe felt sure that the Serpent was operating inside, and that if anything was to be done to prevent the robbery, it must be accomplished at once.

The three moved quietly and cautiously to the house where Morris was still leaning in The boy flushed, as he answered, quickly: It was but a short time, comparatively. his corner, utterly unconscious of the prox-"Now, see here, Kate Fairleigh. Did when the cab stopped at the corner of a imity of any foe, and then Guttersnipe and the lead.

As they reached the top, Barney stumbled was no plant ter catch dem mugs, an' didn't along," commanded the boy, who had fallen | and fell headfirst upon Morris. Quick as a flash Morris drew a blackjack and struck at Barney. The boy was too alert for him, Barney found a convenient hitching-post, however, and he stopped the weapon before eave evidence of the immense strength pos- snipe, as he tried to see who their captors sessed by the Jew, especially now that he were. capture.

Irishman was taken by surprise, and when Morris struck at him he fell down two of the steps, but Guttersnipe's interposition prevented Morris taking advantage of the accident, and he felt the Irishman's clutch on his throat before he could follow him down.

Guttersnipe jumped around the combatants, but now that he had taken the blackjack away, he could not do anything else, because the combatants were moving around so much that it was not easy to distinguish one from the other in the darkness.

The two men practiced all the tricks known to the trained athlete, and the Jew showed | Guttersnipe, whose bump of veneration was that he possessed a knowledge of scientific wrestling that would hardly have been expected of such a man. As for Barney, he had all an Irishman's love for manly sports, and had been the terror of Ballygooran before he left the "ould dart," besides winning several prizes for wrestling at the athletic club in the Tenderloin District of New York, of which he was a member. With two such redoubtable wrestlers, it is no wonder that the combat looked doubtful for a few moments. But then Barney, with a dexterous turn of the wrist and ankle, sent Morris flying into a corner, and was kneeling on his | whose eyes had been so wide open ever since | "Don't you worry about Kate," put in the antagonist's chest before the latter could re- Mr. Vantine stepped in front of him that it | irrepressible Snipe. "She is a thoroughcover himself.

had taken from Billy the Bowler, as if he often during the last day or two that he the door, and looking cautiously around, would have liked to give his old-time enemy | could not find words to express his state of | to see that there were no eavesdroppers, a hearty crack with it, but Kate held his mind. hand, as she whispered that it would be a cowardly act to strike the man now that he say to me?" asked the banker, pleasantly was helpless.

ped the club, showing that he agreed with lily. her, and then he put the stick to another stout cord, with a big fish-hook on the end. dexterously thrust the stick across the Jew's | good girl she is, let me tell yer." back and under his arms, and tied it there with the ease and skillfulness of an old sailor so that Morris Cohen was as helpless as a trussed chicken.

"Now, Kate, you just stand here till we come back."

"What for?" asked the girl, who did not relish the arrangement.

"Don't yer see? Cohen is here on guard, while dey's workin' der racket in der bank. If dey looks out, an' don't see Cohen here, dev will smell a rat, an' de old scheme may fall t'rough. If you stand here dey won't be missal. able ter tell you from Cohen."

The girl did not demur any longer, but snipe. took her stand as directed, and in another five minutes Morris Cohen was in the cab. that had already seen so many strange adventures, and was tied in hand and foot, Snipe producing a lot more fish-line for this pur-Dose.

lieve Kate, just as a flood of light came from are therefore in my interest."

one of the windows of the bank, and a face Guttersnipe uttered a loud whistle, while daylight, and even then he would not be was seen, apparently looking out to see whether Morris Cohen was still at his post.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE SERPENT RUN TO EARTH. THE light at the window of the bank | showed only for a moment, and then the tlash of light told the three watchers that something unusual was going on, and they Kate Fairleigh being just as earnest in the matter as her two companions.

They were all standing on the steps of snipe's active mind was busy trying to settle what next to do, when a decided surprise burst upon them.

seized one of the party, who were all drawn of affording a view of the bank window. firmly, though not roughly, into the house, and the door shut.

was desperate. He seemed to realize that All three were held so firmly, however, the meshes of the law were drawing around; all in a straight line, with their faces tohim, and he fought with the tenacity of a ward the closed front door, that they could Kate Fairleigh. wild beast at bay, who sees only death in not see who or what manner of persons were holding them. They saw that the hall was But Morris, strong as he was, would not magnificently furnished, with a hall rack have been a match for Barney alone. The and other articles of the most costly description, while under their feet was a soft carpet such as is not usually found in the hall of a house, unless it belongs to a person of lavish tastes and practically boundless wealth, but that did not surprise them, because they knew that the house was one such as would be occupied only by a very rich man.

They were not left long in doubt as to silence, as he said to the girl, kindly: whose hands they had fallen into, for a tall, dignified gentleman stepped in front of them, and eyed each of them keenly, without speaking. "Well, guvner, what's der guff?" asked fore we get him under control." very small, and who cared no more for a tishing from the dock at every opportunity. "You are the boy they call Guttersnipe," "S'help me! I didn't know yer," cried ing restored to my friends."

The banker smiled, and Barney Doran, every woman." seemed as if they could never close again, | bred, and I know it." Guttersnipe raised the thick stick that he said nothing. He had been surprised so Without further parley, the banker opened Guttersnipe did not answer, but he drop- do all the talking," answered Barney dream-

"Who is this young lady?" asked Mr. The banker paused for a moment at the if his mind was trying to grasp something the bank building. that would persist in eluding him, as he "Follow me closely," he whispered to seen that face before?"

At the same moment, he signed to the "You bet!" men who were holding the three visitors all Mr. Vantine paused, and ran his hands friend of mine, who is out of town, and who ed unhesitatingly. has allowed me the use of it, so that I can The door was of iron, but covered outside worked at your bank over dere?" asked the Walter, and another was the Twister Detecbuilding was as dark as before. Still, the boy, as the banker walked up and down, tive! with his hands behind him, still thinking.

Barney looked into the banker's face with a sure of discovering the secret. was going on.

were all determined to find out what it was, smiled calmly, as he replied: "I know all door softly, the spring-lock dropping into about it, but the time has not yet come for place with a barely perceptible click. me to act.

the house, looking at the bank, while Gutter- in the window of the bank, like that the boy and his companions had noticed before, and that could be seen through the parlor window of the mansion, the banker having great caution, The door behind them suddenly opened, opened the door that communicated with and four men appeared, three of whom each | the hall, evidently with the express purpose

"That is the signal," he observed, quietly. "Will you and Barney come with me?"

Then there commenced a struggle that seen," exclaimed the irrepressible Gutter- Guttersnipe, promptly, while Barney simply bowed his head in acquiescence.

> "Come, then," said the banker, putting on his hat, and unfastening the front door.

"And what is to become of me?" asked

"You can remain here, in the parlor." answered the banker. "In the library adjoining, you will find plenty of books, and I have no doubt you can find amusement for the short time we shall be absent." "Why cannot I go with you?" asked the girl, eagerly.

"Well, may I never see the back of my neck, if dat ain't a nice t'ing for a girl to ask," exclaimed the Snipe.

The banker raised his hand to command.

"I do not think it is a sort of expedition in which a woman should be concerned. Jim Daly, the Serpent, is a desperate man, and there may be a deadly struggle there be-

"That is the reason I want to be there," was the girl's answer. "I want to see Jim millionaire than he did for any of his com- Daly brought to the end of his career. Itpanions with whom he was in the habit of is to him that I am indebted for the loss of home and friends, and I am always in hope of making him reveal certain secrets he said the stranger, quietly. "Are you not?" | holds about me, that may result in my be-

Guttersnipe. "You must have growed "Strange! What can she mean?" muttersince I seen yer last. You are Alec Van- ed the banker, adding aloud: "Well, if you tine, the man w'ot owns der bank, ain't yer? | are determined, I will not oppose your com-W'ot fun we had yesterday mornin' didn't ling. But you must remember that you may need more nerve than is vouchsafed to-went down the steps and crossed the road "Well, Barney, haven't you anything to swiftly, with his three companions at his heels, Guttersnipe gallantly taking Kate by "Divil a word. I'm lettin' the b'ye here the arm, with an air of protection that would have been funny if he had not been so thoroughly in earnest.

use. Drawing from one of his pockets some | Vantine, of Guttersnipe. | bottom of the steps leading to the bank, but, "Dis is de Kate Fairleigh w'ot I told yer to the surprise of the others, did not ascend indicating what it had been used for, he about," was the ready answer. "An' a the steps to the bank door. Instead of doing so, he kept along down the side street, "I am sure of it. She shows it in her in the deep shadow, till he came to a blank face," said the banker, in a musing tone, as | wall that seemed to be a continuation of added, under his breath: "Where have I Guttersnipe, who was immediately behind this time, and they saw that they had been over the bricks till he found a certain spot, in the grasp of three stout footmen, who | that he pressed with his forefinger. Then disappeared through a door at the end of his companions saw that what they supposed the hall as the banker waved his hand in dis- was a brick wall was not just what it seemed. In response to the pressure of the "Is dis your house, Alec?" asked Gutter- | banker's finger, there was a click, as of a spring lock, and then he pushed with his "No," answered Alexander Vantine, with | hand on the wall, and a regular door opened, a smile. "But it belongs to a very intimate revealing a black space into which he plung-

keep my eye on my bank without it being with paint and plaster in so ingenious a. known. I tell you this, because I know manner that no one would suspect it to be Then he and Barney hurried back to re- you are working with Captain Corden, and anything but brick and mortar unless he mystified expression that seemed to ask This door was very rarely used. In fact, some one to kick him, to bring him back to until this night it had not been opened for an understanding of where he was and what | years, and its very existence was known to only two or three persons besides Alexander "Well, do yer know dat dere's a job bein' Vantine. One of those persons was his son,

The banker waited till all three of his fol-Alexander Vantine recovered himself, and lowers were inside, and then he closed the

"Be jabers, this is as black as a nager's At this moment there was a flash of light | pocket," muttered Barney Doran, as he held to Guttersnipe's shoulder.

> They could hear the banker moving softly in front of them, and they followed him with

At length a door opened, and they found that they had been walking along a narrow hallway, ending in the door that the banker had opened, and through which a faint glim. mer of light could be discerned.

"Well, dis is der greatest gag I've ever "Dat's w'ot we are here fer," answered "Now be very quiet," whispered then banker. "I want to see how the land lies." He walked through the doorway, and disappeared.

"Now, phwat will we do?" asked Barney, softly, depending on the boy, as usual.

"Keep still," was the answer.

The girl was trembling. The whole proceeding was so mysterious and uncanny that she feared she knew not exactly what.

whispered the gamin.

shot, followed by a confusion of men's of steps of the bank, with his gaze on the tongues, and the banker staggered through | cab, which loomed up indistinctly in the the doorway, with a streak of blood on his | darkness. pale face, and he fell in a heap at the feet of Kate.

"Take care of him, Kate!" shouted Snipe.

"Barney, follow me!"

"Oi wull thot!" cried the Irishman, only too glad to get into some sort of active business, as he followed the boy through the doorway.

Snipe rushed in headlong, and a flash of few minutes for Snipe. he was going. He heard Corden's voice cry: they been doing to my poy?" squeaked a "Look out!" and then he turned a somer- voice that Snipe knew only too well. unpleasantness.

see some enemy that he could hit.

tive, whom Barney could not see, and yet share of de ducats. Blow her ugly old hide! have no sense?" grumbled Morris. who seemed to be somewhere close at hand. | She'll fool herself dis time, if de court knows "What's going on? Why, we've got Jim herself!" Daly, the Serpent, safe at last!

at the detective's breast with a long, wicked. that the old woman was not deficient in looking knife. "Not yet, Cool Bob!"

the knife, and sent it spinning to the other crib under the wharf on the East River. end of the long room, just in time to keep. The old woman was leaning into the cab, the point from entering the detective's and Snipe heard Morris growling inside, as breast.

The Serpent uttered a yell of mingled rage and defiance, and then darted through the tered Snipe. doorway, where Kate Fairleigh was kneeling on the floor, supporting the head of the her by her arkles, gave a shove that she cept Mother Rachel. banker, who had fallen into a swoon.

The Serpent did not notice Kate or Alex- heels into the cab, on top of Morris. ander Vantine in the darkness of the hallway, and as he rushed through, intent on gaining | head!" howled Morris, as Snipe, quick as a the secret door, that had been revealed to flash, unhitched the horse, and leaping upon him by the entrance of the banker and his his back, drove him full tilt up the street. companions, he stumbled over the girl, and 'Snipe's object was to get to a police ing in contact with the wall so heavily as to jover the two worthies inside the cab into the stun him for the moment. Before he could hands of the authorities. He did not stop to recover. Barney Doran was upon him, hold- think that he might find himself in a rather ing him down by the back of his neck with awkward position, and that Morris and his it out now." a grip of iron.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE TABLES TURNED ON SNIPE.

which he had fallen.

"You little whelp!" hissed the Scrpent. stranger was having fun with them.

"If I had time, I'd-" me tired. I own as much of this here hole thoor, and her knees in Morris chest, that as you," was Snipe's rejoinder, as he coolly, she could not get out in a hurry. Morris placed his feet on each side of the Serpent's head and drew himself out.

could not help admiring the reckless pluck | man still more firmly down. of the boy, and he did not retaliate to any the bottom of the strange place in which breath was being squeezed out of him. they found themselves—an attempt that "I can't get up, mein tear! I vas caught was a signal failure, for the boy was ex- like I vas in a vise," came in smothered acpecting it.

floor above, and crawling out between the detective's feet, bestowed a knowing wink and released the old woman's head from the upon Walter Vantine, and scuttled out of the front door.

Just then, we know already.

tind out. Dem fellers in de bank has de ing off. Serpent all right, I guess, an' I ain't wanted dere 'cept p'raps me girl will get lonesome "Don't be afraid, Kate. I'm wid yer," while I'm away."

The boy grinned at his conceit, and then Suddenly there was the sound of a pistol- walked deliberately down the long flight

Suddenly he stopped and strained his eyes to try to make out what that moving figure could be at the horse's head.

"It's a woman, by jiminy! Hully chee! If dat Morris ain't going ter git away, I'm a light blinded him temporarily, so that he "It vas all right, Morris, my tear. I vas boy, and she did not want to leave her son could not see what he was doing or where here! Oh, Mother of Abraham, v'at vas in his present predicament.

Vantine, was only just saved from the same the houses for a moment, preparatory to and fumbled at the cords on her son. making a rush upon Mother Rachel. "Oh, "Oh, save us! Phwat's going on?" cried yes, sure enough!" he added, as he saw cally, however, and she fumbled at them for Barney, in his bewilderment, as he tried to through the affair. "She knew dat dis here a minute without getting one of the knots job was bein' done, an' she t'ought it might untied. "What's going on?" repeated the detec- be as well for her to come and look after her

The boy was a little nervous about tack-"Have you?" yelled the stentorian tones ling Mother Rachel, especially if she had of Jim Daly, as he sprung apparently from | Morris to help her. Guttersnipe was only a the floor at Barney's feet, and aimed a blow boy, after all, and he knew by experience strength, and that her arm would gain in-It would have been the last moment of the creased power from the vindictive feeling he tried to break away from his cords.

"Now is my time to take a hand," mut-

He rushed at Mother Rachel, and seizing could not resist, and turned her head over

"Ow! Vat you doing? Git off my went sprawling at full length, his head com- station, or to find a policeman, and turn mother could probably swear harder than he when it came to what he would have called a "show-down."

He was sifting on the horse, well toward | Eub them hard, and help me to be meinself GUTTERSNIPE was too active a youth to his neck, whooping and yelling, while the again. remain quietly in a hole, either actual or two people in the cab, all of a heap, were tigurative. When he dropped through the too much confused to know just what was a few mements of vigorous rubbing, puncfloor he fell squarely on the Serpent's going on. They knew that they were being tured by groans of pain from Morris, that shoulders, knocking him backward, just as driven away, but neither of them had recog-gentleman was able to sit up, and take ache was trying to crawl out of the trap into nized Snipe, and the idea that possessed tive part in the job on hand. them both was that some mischievous

"Oh, git off de earth! You mugs make awkward position, with her head on the was still tightly tied, and of course he could not assist her Moreover, Snipe had banged Jim Daly uttered a growling oath, but he the two doors shut, which held the old wo-

"Get up! Get up! V'at vas you lying greater extent than to try to throw Snipe to down there for?" gasped Morris, whose

cents from the floor, where the old woman With a light spring, Snipe reached the was squirming like a very ugly old toad.

Morris, bound as he was, writhed a little, corner into which it was thrust, and where her son's feet had held her still more firmly. How the Serpent got out and what hap- | With a mighty effort, she managed to get herself right side up, and then, recognizing

"I wouldn't trust Morris by himself no- Snipe, stting on the horse, and urging it how, even if he was chained down wid de along with all his might, she made a jump Atlantic cable," observed Snipe, confidential- for him, pushing the two doors, open with a ly, to himself as he looked across to the crash, and actually lay over the horse's back, place where the cab stood. "I don't know and pulled the boy down, so that he was whether he's in de cab now, but I'll soon lying backward, in imminent danger of fall-

"Let go, will yer?" he bawled. "I'll drive de horse onter de sidewalk if you don't, and smash the whole outfit."

"Come back here, and untic me, vill you?" shricked Morris, from the cab, who saw what was going on, and did not relish the idea of being smashed, without having the power to help himself in the least. "Vat an old fool you vas. I'll give that poy all the fun he vants if I vonce gets out of this."

"Don't you hear what Morris says?" cried Snipe, who only wanted to get out of the clutches of Mother Rachel for a moment, feeling confident that he could attend to and over to the cab was the work of a very; The old woman was in a quandary. She did not think it safe to loosen her hold on the

To run down the remainder of the steps everything after that.

Giving one vicious wrench at the boy's shoulder-which, however, had no effect set down a hole that seemed to him for the "Strike me wealthy, if dat ain't de old save to cause him to pull at the lines with moment to be about half a mile deep, while woman. Who gave her de tip, I wonder?" one hand, and turn the horse toward the Barney, caught around the waist by Walter thought Snipe, as he kept in the shadow of sidewalk—she drew herself back into the cab

They had been tied carefully and scientifi-

"Cut it! Vat vas you doing? Vas you

The old woman drew a formidable jackknife from her dress, and, opening the blade with her teeth, cut at the cords.

"Oh!" shrieked Morris. "You vas carving me all up! Cut the string, but don't stick the knife into me."

Snipe, who had brought the horse to a quiet canter, laughed in his sleeve. He could not help enjoying the troubles of the people detective but for the prompt, yet mechani- she bore toward him, especially after the way in the cab, although he knew that he was in cal action of Barney Doran, who struck up he had beaten her at her own game in his a rather bad predicament. The sight of a boy riding on the back of a cab-horse, with no one in the driver's seat, would attract attention anywhere, and he had seen plenty of belated pedestrians staring at him, including one or two policemen. The pace had been too hot for any interference, however, and so far he had not been disturbed by any one ex-

Half a dozen cuts at the cord, and Morris was free.

"Now, Morris, my tear, help me get that Guttersnipe into the cab, and ve vill soon have him down in Baxter street again,"

"Yes, and the next time v'at he gets away, we will give him leave stay," said Morris. He was about to spring out of the cab, but sunk back with a cry of pain. The cerds had held him so long that he was too benumbed for any activity, and he found

"Vat vas the matter with me?" he exclaimed, helplessly. "I vas not able to move meinself. Rub mein arms, mother.

Mother Rachel did as requested, and after

Meanwhile, the boy had, quietly and unnoticed, climbed off the horse's back, to the The old woman had fallen in such an cab, and up to the driver's seat, where he had more control of the animal, and where he could watch the proceedings of the Cohens through the trap in the roof of the vehicle.

> He was not long left in doubt as to the intentions of the mother and son. Morris stood up and grasped the lines, thus taking all control of the horse out the hands of the boy above.

"Hully chee! Dat's what I might have expected," muttered Snipe. "Pity I didn't stay where I was. So long as I was on de horse's back dey couldn't do much harm, 'cause I wouldn't have allowed 'em to play de trick de old woman did more dan once, you can bet."

The Jew had the horse now, and he drew him up to the curb and stopped him.

As he did so, Snipe leaped to the ground. He was not quick enough to escape Morris. however, who, now that he had got over the fury, and was actually jumping up and numbness caused by the cords, was as nimble down in his excitement. as a cat, in spite of his being hampered with | "V'at's the matter, mein tear?" asked worn all the time.

now!" cried Morris, in triumph, as he seized the boy by the neck, and threw him into the gutter.

"Not yet, Morris, my old gilly! I don't allow no mug in woman's togs ter take liberties wid me!" returned the boy, as he sprung from the gutter like lightning, and delivered a blow in Morris Cohen's chest.

Snipe threw so much exertion into the blow that it made him recoil into the road, where Mother Rachel, who had got out of the cab on the other side, was just coming to the relief of her son.

"Vat vas the matter, mein tear?" she quarreling with my son, vas you?"

As she spoke she seized the boy behind, and, with a sudden exercise of strength, threw him in a heap into the cab, as Morris, who had recovered from the boy's blow, leaped in on the other side, and held him down.

"Queeck!" cried Morris, breathlessly. "Ve must not be found here, an' there vas a policeman on the corner.

"Is there?" muttered Snipe, to himself. Then, before his captors could interfere. or realize what he was about to do, he placed his two forefingers in his mouth, and emitted a whistle that could be heard nearly a quarter of a mile, and which woke up the police officer dozing on the corner so thoroughly, that he was fully persuaded he had your own way yet. The police are on to heard something, and was almost inclined to make an investigation.

"Oh, you vicked poy!" exclaimed Morris, with a sneering grin. "V'ere v'asy ou learn that habit right avay."

with the black vail from his bonnet, that he | would reveal a good many secrets that it vill get avay, and where vill I be?" had worn in his character of an old lady. | would not be healthy to them to be made "Down below," answered Morris, with a Then, with hasty movements, he picked up | public property. pieces of the cord that had bound him, and tied the boy's feet and hands.

. "Now, mother, you vas vatch him, and I vill drive down to the crib," said the Jew, as he completed the tying of Snipe, very much to his own satisfaction and the corresponding discomfiture of his victim, who, however, was thinking hard in the hope of hitting upon some means of escape, even yet.

Mother Rachel seated herself by the side of Snipe, administering three or four sly punches in his ribs for her own personal satisfaction, as Morris climbed into the driver's seat and drove down-town.

The horse was pretty well tired after all his running about during the evening, and the Jew did not urge him very fast. He was in no particular hurry, because he had to go back to the bank now, and that all he at Ikey Bill in a threatening manner. had to do was to get to the crib in Baxter street and wait till the Serpent let him know how the Vantine bank job had come out.

In due course he reached the store on Baxter street, and giving the usual signal, Ikey Bill made his appearance, and admitted the two Cohens and their prisoner.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SNIPE'S LITTLE SCHEME.

"An! Vas dot you, Ikey?" exclaimed Morris, as the door opened. "I vas glad to get home again. I have a nice, tear little boy in dot cab. Help me get him out."

"Where is he?" asked Ikey Bill, in rather a surly tone. "I think you might have let me do something on that Vantine job. I've heard something about the way it's going, and I don't like it."

There was a threatening ring in the man's in sneezing to pay attention to anything else. voice, that made Morris look at him, first in surprise, and then in anger.

Do you think I vas lettin' you or any of the jas if accidentally, shuffled one of his feet gang run my peesness? Vhy, I could hang and gave the knife a kick toward the boy. the whole crowd of you, if I vas vanted to. | Snipe was naturally keen, and the position

You know dot, don't you?"

the cab, with one eye on Snipe, lying help-"You young rascal! You was caught less and gagged on the seat, and the other on Ikey Bill.

> "Mutiny! Dot's v'at it vas! But never mind! Vait! Dot's all! Vait!" answered

Morris, jerkily.

Ikey did not say anything more, but went to the cab to see what was inside. He started as he recognized the boy. He had never been a particular friend of Snipe's, but he hated Morris so much that he was disposed to do anything to oppose him.

"Don't see any use in tying the boy up that way," observed Ikey. "But I suppose you know your business."

croaked, in a sarcastic tone. "You was not | boy in his arms, carried him into the store, | Ikey suspected treachery of some kind at Morris and Mother Rachel watching him very closely and suspiciously the while.

"Put him down," commanded Morris, when, safely inside the store, with the door locked, he looked at the boy who had caused him so much trouble, and who had come near beating him in his game altogether.

Ikey took the gag out of Snipe's mouth, without asking Morris's permission, and then, stooping down, with a knife in his hand, cut the cords that fastened his ankles.

No sooner was Snipe free to speak than he made good use of the privilege.

"You mugs think you are smart, don't yer?" he asked, of Morris, with a turning up of his nose that spoke unutterable contempt. "But you haven't got everything this crib, and you will have dem here afore mornin'. You hear me."

Morris and Mother Rachel turned pale, although both laughed derisively. They to vhistle like that? We must cure you of | were both thinking the same thing-what "Go down and see that everything is if the boy should be telling the truth, and clear," ordered Morris. He took from his mother the jacknife that | the police really were about to make a raid?

"Get him into the lower room right away, Ikey," ordered Morris, apparently forgetting his late dispute with the man.

"Put him down yourself," was Ikey Bill's thing is closed?" response to this command.

"V'at?" yelled the Jew. "Von't you do as I tell you?" " No."

of Ikey Bill. It was, as the Jew had said, a clear case of muiny.

"V'at you think of this?" asked Morris, of Mother Rachel in a tone that expressed his utter astonishment at the presumption of the "Crazy," was Mother Rachel's sententious comment.

"Vell, I'll take him down meinself, and then you look out for yourself. You vas in , made up his mind that it would not be safe | a bad fix, I tell you," said the Jew, looking

Ikey Bill shrugged his shoulders, and beat his hand upon a pile of coats that happened to lie on the counter by his side until he raised a perfect hurricane of dust.

Mother Rachel began to sneeze violently. The coats had lain there for some time, and the pungent dust was very irritating to the nostrils, hers being unusually sensitive.

"Vat you doing, you idiot? You are spoiling them coats, and choking us all with dust," she spluttered.

Morris caught the dust at this moment, and he began to sneeze as violently as his mother, while Ikey Bill, with a malicious grin, beat the coats with the palm of his hand, harder than ever.

Had he any particular motive in this performance, more than that of annoying the two Cohens? It really seemed like it, for he never took his eyes off Snipe, although Morris and his mother were too much occupied escape, and he knew instinctively that Ikey Bill was on his side.

While the sneezing was at its height, Ikey dropped the knife with which he had cut "V'at you mean? V'at you talking about? | the cords binding Snipe's ankles, and then, on Morris.

Snipe had been sitting on a trunk, with the woman's clothes, that, of course, he had | Mother Rachel, as she stood at the side of his hands tied before him, but his feet were free, and with them he soon drew the knife so closely that he could reach it with one of his hands by stooping forward, without making any violent movement.

> In another moment he had the knife in his hand, and, although it was not a very easy task, he managed to cut the cords that bound his wrists, and he was free so far as his personal movements were concerned.

> Ikey had stopped his thumping of the coats, and Morris, wiping his face and swallowing his indignation with considerable of the dust, commanded Mother Rachel to go and open up the traps to the lower floors. "Who is in the house, Ikey?" he asked.

He leaned into the cab, and taking the in a very mild tone—so mild, indeed, that once, while Snipe muttered, "case of jolly, sure!"

"No one," answered Ikey, shortly.

"V'at? Have all the tear boys gone out for the night? Dot was very bad. They must learn to stay in nights, like good little boys. Eh, Ikey?"

"Don't know nothing about it," growled Ikey, uncompromisingly, while Snipe grinned, as he saw that Morris could not win the man over, however hard he might try.

"Vell, go on, mother. Open up the place, and ve vill put this bad boy down below. vhere he von't do no more harm."

Mother Rachel unlocked the parlor door, and opened the trap in the floor, under the carpet, in the manner described in an earlier chapter, the three others watching her carelessly, for they were all familiar with the workings of the place, so that it had no particular interest for them as a curiosity, as it would have had for a stranger.

"Vell, I don't know about dot," objected she still held in her hand, and closing it, They knew that a turning up to the light Mother Rachel. "Suppose I find dot thrust it into Snipe's mouth, tying it there of the interior of this crib on Baxter street everything isn't clear, I'll be caught, and you

"Morris, you vas an undutiful son." "And you vas an undutiful mother. Go on. Who could be down there, when every-

The old woman looked in the direction of Ikey in a peculiar way, that Morris understood, evidently, for he said, quickly and impatiently:

There was no mistaking the determination | "Don't fear dot. He vouldn't dare. It vould be as much as his neck vas vorth to give the crib avay. You can trust Ikey. Can't she, Ikey, mein tear?" he added, turning toward that morose individual.

Ikey answered with a sniff, that might. mean anything, and the old woman disap peared down the trap.

"Look around everywhere," called Morris, down the hole.

He was leaning over, peering into the darkness, and listening intently, that he might have early notice if there was anything wrong—for he did not place such implicit confidence in Ikey as he had pretended -when Snipe stole up behind him, and touched Ikey on the shoulder.

Ikey turned quickly, and he and the boy exchanged glances that spoke volumes, without either uttering a word. They understood each other in a moment.

The boy had conceived a plan, that he believed Ikey Bill would help to carry out, although the man had been guilty of so many offenses, in the way of picking pockets, and crimes of that nature, that he would not dare to show himself where there were likely to be any officers of the law. Snipe meant to capture Morris Cohen again, bind him with the same cord he had worn before, put him in the cab, and take him back to the bank, so that Captain Corden would not know that he had ever been away. The scheme was a bold one, and the boy was particularly pleased with it because it struck a vein of humor in his composition, and he thought it would be an excellent joke

He could not explain all this to Ikey now, but he made him understand the main and primary purpose, which was to make Morris in which he was now made him more so than a prisoner and prevent the old woman from The Jew had worked himself in a perfect usual. He was looking for some chance of getting out of the lower part of the house, where she was now blundering about, in accordance with her son's command.

Ikey was a saturnine individual, but he indulged in a quiet smile as he understood what the boy intended to do, and entered into the job heart and soul.

Morris was leaning so far forward that a comparatively slight push would have sufficed to send him headlong down the hole | that the detective was in the bank at all. after his mother. But this was not Snipe's | When the beard came away in his hand, intention. He wanted Morris in the cab, and he saw that dreaded face, he realized outside the bank, and he was going to have that he had been completely fooled, and his him there. So, watching his opportunity, first thought when he had recovered himself he suddenly seized Morris around the waist, a little, was not how to overcome the detecand threw him to one side into the arms of | tive, but how he might be revenged on Wal- | high, so that any one entering or leaving Ikey Bill, which closed around him with a ter Vantine, who had sunk carelessly upon hearty, if not affectionate, hug, and then the sofa in his father's room, and was gazing the boy snapped the trap into place, kicked at the scene with a keen enjoyment of the if he could. the carpet over it, and turned the heavy | Serpent's discomfiture. table over that, so that the old woman was a Not heeding the detective's pistol, that door, and one of them came so near his hand least for a time.

"V'at vas the matter?" spluttered Morris. "Nothing," answered the apathetic Ikey. overcome his late tormentor, however. He stepped up in front of Morris, and seizing him by the nose, gave it a vigorous tweak.

"No, nothing is de matter, Morris, only a little jolly. You and de oder mugs has got themselves into a nice little picnic, and I'm | kept my word with you. I've helped you to playing de music for you to dance to. See?"

"Ikey Bill, you will be in the Tombs inside is not my fault." of twelve hours. I have the evidence all ready. I always keep it so that I can pro- | seemed to render the Serpent desperate, for before, eh? But you vill find out dot vas in spite of the presented pistol, and would true."

Ikev seemed somewhat disturbed by this assertion of Morris, but Snipe treated it with the utmost contempt.

"You wouldn't dare to go near no police, if you was to get a t'ousand dollars for it, an' you know it, Morris. Don't take no notice of his guff, but bring him out to de cab. All the detective and Walter, hissed: de cords is in dere, 'cept what was on me, an' dey is here, right handy."

As the boy spoke he picked up the cords that had been around his own wrists and ankles, and, knotting them together where they had been cut, soon had Morris tied up as scientifically as he was before. "Shove the gag in his mouth," suggested Ikey Bill.

"Dat's right. I will. He made me wear it all de way down-town, an' we'll see how he likes it," observed Snipe.

So Morris Cohen was duly decorated with the big knife thrust between his teeth, with the vail that he had worn so gracefully fastened to it, to prevent its slipping out of place.

They carried him to the cab, and threw him upon the seat, adding the other cords they found in the cab, so that he should be to nab you, and I think I have succeeded. surely tied up, and ready for the inspection | You did not know there was another door of Captain Corden when they got to the to that vault, at the back, reached by a bank.

he had no doubt that the Serpent was a you have a pull on this young man with for me," he muttered, bitterly. prisoner, and that the great Vantine bank your bogus forged checks, and your agreeworst bank robbers in America.

"Coming with me, Ikey?" asked Snipe, as when Morris was safely inside, and the trap in the roof open, so that he could keep a constant eye upon the prisoner, he took his seat in the driver's place behind.

"No," answered Ikey. "Things are getting too hot around here. I guess I'll go to Chicago, and see the Fair. But don't say nothing. I believe you are a pretty good kid, and I only hope you'll get even with Morris."

be lots of fun when I give him up to de your career."

police."

"No. No police in mine," answered Ikey with a slight shiver. "So-long, Snipe. Wish you luck."

"Thanks!"

Snipe had closed the door of the crib, and had the key in his pocket, and now he drove the horse as fast as he could go in his tired condition, and twenty minutes later the cab of escape—and revenge. stood near the Vantine bank, with Morris bound and helpless, just as he had been be- upon it immediately. While speaking he fore Mother Rachel appeared to rescue him | slowly withdrew into the vault, inch by -a rescue that had ended most unfortunate- inch, and so slyly that Corden did not sus- it is a fool's philosophy to lay out plans for ly for herself as well as her precious son.

CHAPTER XXVII.

SCORE ANOTHER FOR COOL BOB. WE must now go back to the moment when the Serpent found himself so thoroughly checkmated by the detective at the door of the great iron vault.

The Serpent had no more idea of being met in such a manner as that than he had his knife in his hand.

Snipe could not control his joy at having and, with the pistol, that he had drawn quick as a flash, he knocked the knife to one side, and fired a shot through Jim Daly's hat at | the small door in the rear. such close range that the powder slightly scorched his cheek.

"Keep away from me, Jim Daly. I've find your way into the vault, and if you dis-"I'll hang you all!" howled the Jew. | covered more in there than you expected, it

The bantering tone of the young fellow doubtless have done some damage, had not now he was indeed a prisoner! the detective, who had stepped up behind him, seized the hand that held the knife, and given it a twist that made the other yell with "What's de matter wid you?" he said. pain, although he did not drop the weapon.

> The Serpent tore himself away, and retreating to the open door of the vault, so that strongest cell in the Tombs itself. he stood just inside, with his face toward am ready to meet you both in fair fight. You know me. I'm Jim Daly, called the Serpent, because I am always ready to strike, and I never ask for mercy. Come on!"

we fight you? We have you dead to rights. Caught you in the very act of robbing the Vantine bank. You'll go comfortably to Sing Sing. I have nothing more to do with you.

"You think you have me, do you?" hissed the Serpent.

"Kind of think so," was Cool Bob's response.

"Then you are mistaken."

"I don't think so. I took all precautions secret entrance and hallway from the side From all that Snipe had seen at the bank, street. But I did, and I used it. You think if he took it into his head. He has no use lieve anything you could say or any document you could produce.'

"You devil!" muttered the Serpent, between his set teeth.

"I beg your pardon," said the detective, with his tantalizing smile. "So you see, Jim Daly, you can only just stay here till I bring up the wagon for you to take you to the nearest police station. You are a pretty smart crook, but you are only a crook, after "Oh, come along," said Snipe. "It will all, and you must expect a crook's ending of

The detective spoke in an even tone that was maddening to Jim Daly, who began to see that he was hemmed in on all sides, and that he had not one chance in a thousand of escaping from his present predicament.

Te was not the man to give up till he was absolutely overpowered, however, and his mind was busily plotting, to find some means

An idea suddenly struck him, and he acted pect his design.

At last, when he had got so far back that the heavy door could not touch his feet, which, as the door was at least eighteen inches thick, obliged him to go back that distance, he reached forward, and grasping the edge of the door, pulled it toward him with all his strength.

The ponderous mass of iron and steel worked smoothly enough when once he had got a start on it, and he was able to pull it to before either the detective or Walter could interfere.

The Serpent had noticed that the door far in the back which was only about four feet that way would be obliged to stoop-was open, and he determined to get out that way,

Two pistol-shots rung out as he pulled the prisoner, without any means of escape—at was still held on a line with his face, he as to tear a little piece of flesh off one of turned and leaped upon the young man, with his fingers. But the sting did not stop him in his task. He pushed the door open a But Walter Vantine was prepared for him, | little, and then, with a tremendous tug, brought it to with such force that the lock snapped. Then he ran as fast as he could to

> There were some large books on the floor of the vault, that he could not see in the dark, and he stumbled over them and almost fell. He saved himself from going down altogether, however, and with a headlong plunge, made for the doorway.

That stumble was fatal to his plan, even if he did not fall. He reached the doorway, and was in the very act of stooping to go duce it any time. You was not know dot he made another movement toward Walter, through when it shut with a bang, and the snapping of the spring-lock, told him that

He heard the mocking laugh of the detective outside, and in his frenzy of rage and disappointment, he actually banged his head against the iron walls of the vault that held him as securely as if he had been in the

"Curse them! They shall not have it all their own way, even now!" hissed the Ser-"Now, come on, the two of you. You pent, a few minutes later, when he had rehave pistols. I have only my knife, but I covered a little from his rage, and set his usually cool wits to work. "It is evident the job has gone up for the present, and the best thing for me to do is to get out of here -if I can. If I can," he repeated, with a "Jim Daly, you are a fool!" observed the low chuckle." As if there were anything in Twister Detective, quietly. "Why should the power of Cool Bob or any of his gang that could hold Jim Daly down! No, I'll fool him now, and-I'll kill him when the time comes."

He gnawed his black mustache savagely, and set himself to think out what he should do. In truth, he was in an awkward predicament. He had fastened the door of the vault when he came in, and here was the small doorway at the back closed upon him. How could he get out? As he asked himself this question he noticed that the air was getting close and foul, and the horrible thought obtruded itself upon him that he might suffocate before he could escape.

"I believe that fellow Corden would do it

The Serpent was not the man to spend job had resulted in the capture of one of the ment that you forced him to sign. They his time in idle conjectures when there was are not worth the paper they are written on work to do. He dismissed his fear of sufto you. Alexander Vantine would not be- focation with a toss of the head, and made his way cautiously in the dark, which was now absolutely black, with both doors closed, toward the big front door of the vault.

He pressed against it with all his weight, but, as he had expected, it was as firm as a

"I wouldn't care so much about being nabbed, if it were not for that fellow the Twister," he thought. "To think that Jim Daly-the Serpent-should be brought to such a pass with his eyes open. What a fool I was not to keep my eyes on that old watchman. And yet, his disguise was so good that I never suspected for a moment. Jim Daly, your brain must be softening, or you would never have neglected your own maxim, that you have acted by all your life. always to, think that things are not what they seem. When he looked like an old man, you should have made up your mind that he was not an old man, and that he might have been even Robert Corden Thas's what you should have thought. Well, well, times that have passed.'

With this reflection he gave another mighty push on the steel door, almost without thinking what he was doing.

To his great astonishment, it yielded slightly, so that he could see a thin streak of light between the edge of the door and the framework of the doorway.

He was about to push again, and throw the door wide open, when his habitual caution and suspicion made him pause. What would he find on the other side of the door?

He was certain that it had been held securely by a fastening of some kind a moment before, and now that it was open, the fastening must have been removed by human agency.

He placed his ear close to the door and listened intently. Not a sound to give him an inkling of what was being done outside, and this very silence made him all the more suspicious!

threat might be carried out, to bring the whom he was half disposed to regard as there would be murder before he would his knife, but he felt that he could, with his to his baby girl, and disinheriting you ensubmit to such an indignity. If he was to bare hands, tear the mocking devil limb tirely." should be done with some sort of style, and | without interference, for a minute. | was! Why should that brat have taken station like a common criminal.

ly in his left hand, he held his black-jack in useful to a B. & O. locomotive. Lie down, James Vantine, do you?" demanded the his right, and placing his right shoulder | ye divil!" he roared, in a different tone, to against the door, he shoved it wide open the Serpent, as he bestowed a kick with his should obtain a confession from you at last! with all his force.

His knife was uplifted and his blackjack who might oppose him.

But his preparations were needless. There was nobody in sight!

Jim Daly was too suspicious to take all whether the Serpent had escaped. appearances for granted, although he reproached himself for having done so in the case of the old watchman, who had turned out to be his bitterest and most powerful the banker arose to his feet, and staggered sneered the Serpent. enemy, Captain Corden the Twister Detec- into the main apartment of the bank, for he

in all directions.

were in the main apartment of the bank, he expense of the bank. could swear.

although he imagined he could almost dis- the combat was stopped. tinguish the sofa coming back to its own had made an impression as he lay there a short time before. Everything in the bank had that indescribable air of having just been vacated, but not a sign of the people who were there just before was to be seen.

"This is a queer thing," thought the Serpent, "but it means mischief, I'll swear. I've had tussles with Cool Bob before."

He cautiously put his head around the nist. corner of the big steel door, to make sure there was no one lurking there, although, as the entire space behind the door, he had no on the floor. fear of finding any one. It was only his habit of taking every precaution that made him look around at all.

"I'd give a hundred dollars to know what this means," he muttered.

mark, in a whisper that would have been inaudible to any one who might have been in the room, when he found out what it all meant, in a hurry.

He took another step forward, when, crash, the floor opened beneath his feet, and he was dropped into dark space beneath, just as a blinding flash of light in his eyes, and a shock that ran through his whole frame like a wire of fire, told him that electricity was being used against him. Before he could utter a sound, there was the loud snap of a wooden door over him, and he found himself in a sort of box, with the lid fastened so tightly over him that he could not see a ray of light.

Bob, Serpent!" cried a mocking voice that made the Serpent fairly writhe in an agony of rage and discomfiture, as the lid over his head opened, and he saw the detective and Walter Vantine looking down at him, while they held their revolvers ready for instant action.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

RETRIBUTION AND RESTITUTION. "YE shpalpeen! Faith, Oi'll choke the wickedness out of yez, if it wull come out. if yez don't keep shtill," spluttered Barney Doran, as he held the Serpent down to the floor, after his attempt to escape, which was frustrated by his falling over Kate Fairleigh and Alexander Vantine, as described in chapter twenty-four.

The Serpent felt that he was beaten, but his stubborn spirit forbade his acknowledg- you chose to throw off your own name, and Should he make a bold rush, and see? | ing it. His only thought for the moment | become known as Jim Daly, the Serpent, in What else could be do? He did not know was to get Barney off his back, and then Frisco. Your mother was dead, and the how soon the fulfillment of the detective's deal a deadly blow upon the detective, pranks you played in California killed your patrol wagon, and he swore to himself that something more than human. He had lost ing all his property, fifty thousand dollars, be pulled up short in his career, at least it from limb, if he could only get hold of him, 'An infernal robbery! That is what it the Serpent was dragged to the police able to hould him much longer," exclaimed rupted the Serpent, his pent-up wrath burst-Barney. "He's squirming like a tadpole, ing from him in a torrent. Taking out his knife, and grasping it firm- and he has a strin'th on him that w'u'd be was ready to be used on the head of any one of of his father, who, when his face had You abducted the baby, and hid her for been bathed with water, recovered quickly, years, with the intention, some day, when and, maintaining his dignified manner, in you thought it safe, to try and prove that spite of his rather undignified position, asked

"Good! I have something to say to him." you or the child." With the assistance of Kate and his son, He ventured cautiously and slowly out- assisted him to the sofa in his own little side of the door, and stood perfectly still, private room, where he could look at the with his back against the mass of steel, with i Serpent, in the hands of Barney, at the edge its internal network of polished bars and of the hole in front of the vault, and which, bolts, looking with his piercing black eyes | it is perhaps needless to say, was a trap contrived on purpose to catch burglars who Neither Walter Vantine nor the detective | might be trying to enrich themselves at the

The Serpent and Barney were having it He glanced into the banker's private room, | hot and heavy, although without any noise. which with its glass partition walls of wood, They were simply straining every nerve could be seen in every part from where he and sinew to overcome each other, and it stood. No, there was nobody in there, seemed as if something must break unless

It was stopped, and by the detective, who shape where the form of Walter Vantine had been watching the contest with the keen pleasure that an athlete always feels in a trial of strength between two others, almost as much as if he were himself a participant. Corden darted down suddenly, and seized the Serpent by the right wrist. Then, with the mighty twist that was irresistible, he pulled him over, so as to throw Barney upon the floor by the side of his late antago-

With a force that rendered the Serpent powerless, the detective twisted him to his there was a wide crack on the hinge side of | feet, and the next moment had forced a pair the door through which he could see almost of handcuffs upon him, and sat him down

"Stay there, Serpent, and stay there quietly, or I'll put irons on your ankles," remarked Corden, with a smile. "I have them here."

Daly did not reply. He was looking at Hardly had he given utterance to this re- | the banker, who was regarding him with a to his mouth and fired! steadfast gaze.

denly, as he looked full into the eyes of the Serpent.

The Serpent turned an awful white, and then red.

"Ah, it is a good many years since you were addressed by your own name, is it not?" went on Alexander Vantine. "And I suppose you thought that I, who had not seen you since you were a lad of eighteen, would not recognize you now."

"What crazy talk is this?" said the Serpent, sullenly. "My ename is Jim Daly, as hundreds of people in New York know,

"You must score another point for Cool | with a half smile in the direction of Captain

"I know that your name is James Vantine, and that you are the son of my dead brother. I know that you are an ingrate, a thief, and to all intents and purposes a parricide, for your father would be alive now if your evil courses had not driven him prematurely to his grave."

"This is all nonsense," growled the Serpent. "But, even if it were true, what then? It is not claimed that James Vantine-if there is such a man-ever committed any crime that Jim Daly will have to answer for. Is it?"

Kate Fairleigh was standing by the side of the banker, with her earnest gazed fixed upon the Serpent. The banker took her hand, as he continued:

"You had a sister, who was a baby, when father. Before he died he made a will, leav-

the people should never be able to say that | "Be Larry Flaunigan's ghost, Oi'll not be | everything, leaving me a pauper?" inter-

"Aha! Then you acknowledge you are banker, triumphantly. "I thought we knee, with much heartiness and power. The little girl was helpless, and it was then Walter Vantine was kneeling by the side a devilish idea seemed to enter your head. she was dead, so that you could claim the property. Your father's lawyers have the "No, father. We have him safe." will, but they have never been able to trace

"This is the wildest yarn I ever heard,"

"Is it? Well, now let me tell you, that I was still a little weak in his knees. They have traced the baby sister, and can put my hand upon her at any moment." "Can you? And where is she?"

"Here! And she is known as Kate Fairleigh," almost shricked the banker in his excitement, as he led Kate forward.

"It's a lie!" yelled the Serpent, as he sprung to his feet and leaped toward the banker.

But, the detective was ready for him, and as he leaped forward, Jim Daly was seized by the arm, and turned completely around, with dislocated elbow. He fell to the floor in his agony, but Corden, who had had experience of this kind, knelt by his side, and taking his wrist in a firm grasp, pulled it with a jerk, and forced the elbow joint into place again, and without having to remove the handcuffs.

"Here's the wagon," cried Walter Vantine, as the sound of wheels was heard with-

"This is your carriage, Serpent," observed

Corden, pleasantly.

The Serpent had been lying on the floor by the side of the detective, with all sorts of evil thoughts apparent in the changing expressions of his face. As he heard the wheels, and realized that he was to be dragged to a police-station like the common felon for whom he had expressed so much contempt, he reached up with his two handcuffed hands, and before any one knew what he was about, had drawn the revolver from the detective's hip pocket, and with a reckless cry of "Good-by, all," placed the weapon

The shot was an effective one. Jim Daly, "James Vantine," said the banker, sud- the Serpent, was dead, just as Walter Vantide opened the front door of the bank, and admitted a police officer and-Guttersnipe!

"Where did you come from?" asked the detective, in some surprise.

"Don't say a word! It was de prettiest plant I ever saw. You know, while you fellers was enjoying yerselves in de bank, I t'ought I'd just slip out an' see what Morris Cohen was a-doin' in de cab. It was a good job I went. Do yer know, dat sheeny was just gittin' out. He hadn't got all de ropes off, though, so I just held him till de wagon come. Den I hollered ter de mugs in de including many of the police," he added, wagon, and when I told 'em what was bein' done in de bank, an' who I was, and who baby, but, through the exertions of her Morris was, dey helped me git him inter de wagon, but dey made me come along, too. Well, dat was all right, 'cause I wanted ter come. See? An' here I am, an' Morris is out dere in der wagon, kickin' like a horse car mule on Third avenue."

While Guttersnipe was telling his story with the embellishments that suggested themselves to his lively fancy, the officer, at a sign from the detective, had thrown a rug from their wagon over the body of Jim Daly, and were carrying him out. They laid him in the bostom of the wagon, and then one of the officers asked Corden what they were to do with the boy.

"Don't do nothin' wid him," answered that irrepressible youth, for himself. "I'm here wid all me friends-Alec Vantine, Cool Bob and me girl. Git, an' take dat sheeny ter de station-house mighty quick, or he'll give you the slip."

"The boy is all right. Leave him here," said the detective, quietly, and the officers mounted their wagon, and drove away, with the two rascals—living and dead.

"And the Vantine bank has not been rob bed, after all," observed Alexander Vantine. "You never thought it would be, did you?" asked the detective, with a smile.

"Not when you laid bare the whole plot to me, and enabled me to take effectual steps to prevent it. But I'm afraid things would have been in a bad state here, but for you. As for you, Walter, Mr. Corden has told me all about the way in which you fell into that rascal's power. He is dead, but mind you, do not get into such company again. Alas, that I should ever have to say such a thing about a Vantine!"

"Yes, he was my cousin, was he not?" observed the young man, reflectively.

"He'is dead. Let your relationship be buried in his grave," said the banker, solemn-Iy.

The police would have buried James Vantine-known to them as Jim Daly, the Serpent-in Potter's Field, but Alexander Vantine could not forget that the dead was the son of his brother, and he had the funeral conducted from an undertaker's and the corpse deposited in consecrated ground.

Guttersnipe was a waif, and he could not tell who his parents were, or how he had got into the power of the gang in Baxter street. The banker made close inquiries among the police and others who had known the lad for a number of years, and satisfied himself that he was not naturally bad, and that he had never been known to commit a crime. That was enough for Alexander Vantine, who, beneath his stiff exterior, carried a warm heart. He sent the boy to a good school, and there is little in the gentlemanly, but high-spirited lad known as William Vantine tc remind one of the Guttersnipe who was so long a companion of the Baxter street gang. When he has graduated, which he bids fair tc do with high honors in due course, there will be a place for him in the Vantine bank.

The police descended upon the house in Baxter street, and broke up the gang completely. The clothing store is still there, but it is conducted on regular business principles, such as prevail in that unique quarter, and there is nothing of a criminal nature concealed about the premises, as there was in the Morris Cohen days.

Mother Rachel had prudently made herself scarce when she heard, as she soon did, that Morris was in custody and that the Serpent was dead. But she could not keep away from the neighborhood in which she had lived for so long, and in less than a month after Morris Cohen's arrest, she was also a prisoner, charged with being "a fence." She and Morris were both sent to Sing Sing prison for long terms, charged with being receivers of stolen property, and, in addition, Morris was proved to have been concerned in the bank robbery job that resulted in the death of Jim Daly.

Ikey Bill escaped. He was only one of the small fry, anyhow, and the police did not trouble themselves much about him.

Barney Doran gained the desire of his heart and is now one of the most trusted detectives on Superintendent Byrnes's force.

It took a great deal of time and trouble to prove that Kate Fairleigh was really the Ethel Vantine who had disappeared when a uncle, Alexander Vantine, who was so well known and respected that his words carried extra weight, it was done at last, and she came into possession of her fortune of $50,000, which, through the careful investments made by her uncle, is rapidly increasing. She lives with her uncle, and he has what he has not had since the death of his wife, a lady to preside over his household.

One of the frequent visitors to the Vantine mansion is a young man with an innocentlooking countenance, lighted up by darkblue eyes with long lashes, who has a rich crop of golden-brown curls, and who is never excited or in a hurry. He pays particular attention to Ethel Vantine, and rumor says there may be a wedding before long, when the bride will be the niece of the rich banker, Alexander Vantine, and the groom, the famous Captain Robert Corden, the Twister Detective.

THE END.

NEXT DIME, No. 773, IS

Buffalo Bill's Ban:

CODY TO THE RESCUE.

A Romance of the Clean-out in Southwest Colorado.

BY LEON LEWIS, AUTHOR OF "BUFFALO BILL'S DARING ROLE,"

The story of a great clean-out in Southwest Colorado, in which Cody is pitted against terrible odds, but, with all his energies aroused, he is the man for the moment.

A United States fort (Harris) is almost in the hands of the artful and ambitious scoundrels who are terrorizing the region, and whose secret emissaries are among the troops.

A trusted orderly to Colonel Naylor, the old and noted officer in command of the post and district, is indeed, the chief of the mountain scourges, and so is enabled to baffle every attempt to capture or suppress the "Ravagers"-as they are fitly termed.

The mystery of their procedure and the secret of their success is at last placed in the hands of Buffalo Bill to unravel, and how the great scout detective does it this truly Wild West story of Wild West life tells.

Beadle's Dime Library.

BUFFALO BILL NOVELS. By Colonel Prentiss Ingraham. 765 Buffalo Bill's Dozen; or, Silk Ribbon Sam.

761 Buffalo Bill's Mascot. 757 Buffalo Bill's Double.

750 Buffalo Bill's Big Four. 743 Buffalo Bill's Flush Hand.

739 Buffalo Bill's Blind; or, The Masked Driver. 735 Buffalo Bill and His Merry Men.

731 Buffalo Bill's Beagles; or, Silk Lasso Sam. 727 Buffalo Bill's Body Guard.

722 Buffalo Bill on the War-path.

716 Buffalo Bill's Scout Shadowers.

710 Buffalo Bill Baffled; or, The Deserter Desperado. 697 Buffalo Bill's Buckskin Brotherbood. 691 Buffalo Bill's Blind Trail; or, Mustang Madge. 667 Buffalo Bill's Swoop; or, The King of the Mines. 649 Buffalo Bill's Chief of Cowboys; or. Buck Taylor 644 Buffalo Bill's Bonanza; or, Si ver Circle Knights.

362 Buffalo Bill's Grip; or, Oath Bound to Custer. 329 Buffalo Bill's Pledge; or, The League of Three. 189 Wild Bill's Gold Trail; or, The Desperate Dozen. 175 Wild Bill's Trump Card; or, The Indian Heiress.

168 Wild Bill, the Pistol Dead Shot.

By Buffalo Bill.

639 Buffalo Bill's Gold King. 599 The Dead Shot Nine; or, My Pards of the Plains.

414 Red Renard, the Indian Detective.

401 One-Armed Pard; or, Borderland Retribution. 397 The Wizard Brothers: or, White Beaver's Frail.

394 White Beaver, the Exile of the Platte.

319 Wild Bill, the Whirlwind of the West. 304 Texas Jack, the Prairie Rattler.

243 The Pilgrim Sharp; or, The Soldier's Sweetheart. 83 Gold Bullet Sport; or, Knights of the Overland. 52 Death-Trailer, the Chief of Scouts.

By Leon Lewis, Ned Buntline, etc.

682 Buffalo Bill's Secret Service Trail.

629 Buffalo Bill's Daring Role; or, Daredeath Dick. 517 Buffalo Bill's First Trail; or, The Express Rider.

158 Buffalo Bill, Chief of Scouts.

117 Buffalo Bill's Strange Pard; or, Dashing Dandy.

92 Buffalo Bill, the Buckskin King.

BY GEORGE C. JENKS.

755 Wild Pete the Broncho-Buster Detective. 726 Fearless Sam, the Grand Combination Detective.

719 Boston Bob, the Sport Detective. 572 Jaunty Joe, the Jockey Detective.

554 Mad Sharp, the Rustler.

538 Rube Rocket, the Tent Detective. 526 Death-Grip, the Tenderfoot Detective.

507 The Drummer Detective. 432 The Giant Horseman.

398 Sleepless Eye, the Pacific Detective.

ALBERT W. AIKEN'S NOVELS.

Dick Talbot Series,

741 Dick Talbot's Close Call.

737 Dick Talbot in Apache Land. 733 Dick Talbot, the Ranch King.

729 Dick Talbot's Clean-Out. 725 Dick Talbot in No Man's Camp.

384 Dick Talbot in the Rockies; or, Injun Dick. 354 Dick Taluot; or, The Brand of Crimson Cross.

349 Dick, the Gentieman Road-Agent. 107 Dick Talbot, of Cinnabar.

93 Dick Talbot. King of the Road.

41 Dick Talbot in Utab: or, Gold Dan. 38 Dick Talbot's Iron Grip; or, The Velvet Hand.

36 Dick Talbot; or, The Death-Shot of Shasta. 35 Dick Talbot at the Mines; or, Kentuck, the Sport.

34 Dick Talbot's Fee; or, Rocky Mountain Rob. 33 Dick Talbot at White Pine; or, Overland Kit.

Aiken's Fresh of Frisco Series.

660 The Fresh in Montana; or, Blake's Full Hand. 652 The Fresh's Rustle at Painted City.

647 The Fresh at Santa Fe; or, The Stranger Sharp.

556 Fresh, the Sport: or, The Big Racket at Slide Out. 537 Fresh Against the Field; or. Blake, the Lion.

529 The Fresh of Frisco in New York. 497 The Fresh in Texas; or. The Escobedo Million ..

461 The Fresh of Frisco on the Rio Grande.

173 The Fresh in Arizoua; or, California John. 130 The Fresh in Mexico; or, Captain Volcano.

97 The Fresh in Big Walnut Camp; or, Bronze Jack.

77 The Fresh of Frisco.

Aiken's Joe Phenix Series.

749 Joe Phenix's Big Bulge.

745 Joe Phenix's Mad Case.

708 Joe Phenix's Siren; or, The Woman Hawkshaw. 700 Joe Phenix's Unknown; or. Crushing the Crooks

681 Joe Phenix's Specials; or, The Actress Detective

637 Joe Phenix in Crazy Camp.

632 Joe Phenix's Master Search.

628 Joe Phenix's Combin ; or, the Dandy Conspirator 620 Joe Phenix's Silent Six.

601 Joe Phenix's Shadow; or the Detective's Monitor

419 Joe Phenix., the King of Detectives.

391 Joe Phenix's Still Hunt. 161 Joe Phenix's Great Man Hunt.

112 Joe Phenix, Private Detective; or, The League. 79 Joe Phenix, the Police Spy.

Aiken's Miscellaneous Novels.

753 Gideon's Grip at Babylon Bar.

717 Captain Pat McGowen, the Greencoat Detective. 674 Uncle Sun Up, the Born Detective.

670 The Lightweight Detective. 665 The Frisco Detective; or, The Golden Gate Find.

613 Keen Billy, the Sport.

607 Old Benzine, the "Hard Case" Detective.

594 Fire Face, the Silver King's Foe. 583 The Silver Sharp Detective.

577 Tom, of California; or, Detective's Shadow Act. 570 The Actress Detective; or, The Invisible Hand.

562 Lone Hand, the Shadow.

520 The Lone Hand on the Caddo.

490 The Lone Hand in Texas. 475 Chin Chin, the Chinese Detective.

465 The Actor Detective. 440 The High Hor e of the Pacific.

423 The Lone Hand; or, The Red River Recreants.

408 Doc Grip, the Vendetta of Death. 381 The Gypsy Gentleman; or, Nick Fox, Detective. 376 Black Beards; or, The Rio Grande High Horse.

370 The Dusky Detective: or. Pursued to the Ena. 363 Crowningshield, the Detective 320 The Genteel Spotter; or The N. Y. Night Hawk.

252 The Wall Street Blood; or, The Telegraph Girl. 203 The Double Detective: or, The Midnight Mystery.

196 La Marmoset, the Letective Queen. 101 The Man from New York.

91 The Winning Oar; or. The Innkeeper's Daughter..

84 Hunted Down; or, The League of Three. 81 The Human Tiger: or, A Heart of Fire.

75 Gentleman George: or, Parlor. Prison and Street. 72 The Phantom Hand; or, The 5th Avenue Herress. 63 The Winged Whale; or, The Red Rupert of Gulf.

59 The Man from Texas; or, The Arkansas Outlaw. 56 The Indian Mazeppa; or, Madman of the Plains.

49 The Wolf Demon; or. The Kanawha Queen. 42 The California Detective; or, The Witches of N.Y. 31 The New York Sharp; or, The Flash of Lightning. 27 The Spotter Detective; or, Girls of New York.

LATEST AND NEW ISSUES.

756 Old Burke, the Madison Square Detective. By

Wm. G. Patten. 757 Buffalo Bill's Double. By Col. P. Ingraham. 758 The Wizar'l King Detective. By Lieut. Sims.

759 The Sport from St. Louis. By J. W. Osbon. 760 Joe Phenix's Lone Hand. By Albert W. Aiken. 761 Buff. lo Bill's Mascot. By Col. P. Ingraham.

762 Old Grip, the Detective. By Jackson Knox. 763 Dandy Don, the Denver Detective. By Jos. E.

Badger, Jr. 764 The New York Sharp's Shadower. By Wm. H. Manning.

765 Buffalo Bill's Dozen. By Col. P. Ingraham. 766 Detective Zach, the Broadway Spotter. Capt. Howard Holmes.

767 The Sport of Silver Bend. By Wm. R. Eyster. 768 The Prince of New York Crooks. By Patten. 769 Buffalo Bill's Sweepstake. By Col. Ingraham.

770 The Showman Dete tive. By Jackson Knox. 771 Prince John. Detective Special. By J. E. Badger. 772 Captain Corden, the Twister Detective. By Geo. C. Jenks.

773 Buffalo Bill's Ban; or, Cody to the Rescue. By Leon Lewis.

774 Steve Starr, the Dock Detective; or, The Female Race Track Sport. By Wm. H. Manning. 775 King Dandy, the Silver Sport; or, The High Kicker of Salt River. By Albert W. Aiken.

A new issue every Wednesday.

Beadle's Dime Library is for sale by all Mewsdealers, ten cents per copy, or sent by mail on receipt of twelve cents each. BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William street, New York.